This suit originated in the Madison circuit court. The declaration is in assumpsit, and charges, in substance, that on December 17, 1870, Joshua S. Peers et al., the plaintiffs (appellees here), were the owners of coal underlying certain described lands, and by a lease in writing and under seal leased to the Abbey Coal & Mining Company, for the term of twenty-five years, the sole and exclusive right of mining and operating in coal on said lands, in consideration whereof the lessee, said Abbey Coal & Mining Company, agreed, among other stated things, to pay appellees a minimum rent of $1,200 a year; that said Abbey Company sunk a shaft, and operated a mine until August 11, 1886, when, by its deed of that date, it granted, bargained, sold, assigned, transferred, and set over to the Consolidated Coal Company of St. Louis, defendant, the coal underlying said tracts of land, together with all the rights, privileges, and appurtenances thereunto appertaining or belonging, as the same were assured by said lease, and subject to the agreements therein mentioned to be performed by said lessee, and thereby covenanted and agreed to and with the defendant that it was seized of a perfect title to the property thereby conveyed, and that the same was free from all other and prior encumbrances, except those above specifically mentioned, and that it would warrant and defend the same to the defendant and to its successors; that the defendant took possession of the property by said deed conveyed to it, and from thence until the commencement of this suit has had the use, control, and enjoyment thereof, without molestation, interference, or hindrance on the part of the plaintiff, and during that time, to wit, from the 20th day of September, 1891, until the 20th day of September, 1894, there accrued to them, under and by virtue of the provisions of said lease, for and on account of royalty guaranteed, the sum of $3,600, which has not been paid. The declaration then avers, in substance: By means whereof the defendant has become liable to pay to the plaintiffs the said sum of $3,600, according to the terms and effect of the provisions of said lease and of said deed; and, being so liable, etc., undertook and promised, etc. To this declaration the following plea was filed: "And now comes the said defendant, by Charles W. Thomas, its attorney, and for a plea in this behalf says actio non, because it says that on the 28th day of November, A. D. 1887, it, the said defendant, by its instrument in writing of that date under its corporate seal, did assign and set over to one Jacob Lasurs, of said county, the lease in the declaration mentioned as having been made and executed by plaintiffs, and all the leasehold interest and estate thereby conveyed, and did put the said Lasurs into possession of the mine and premises in said lease described, by virtue whereof said Lasurs became, and since said time hath been, the sole lessee of said mine and premises under said lease, without this: That the defendant has had the use, control, and enjoyment of the said mine and premises from, to wit, the 20th day of September, A. D. 1891, to the 20th day of September, A. D. 1894, as is by the said declaration supposed, and this the defendant is ready to verify; wherefore," etc. Thereupon the plaintiffs moved the court to strike said plea from the files "for the following reasons, to wit: Because said plea does not answer the declaration, and presents an immaterial issue." The court allowed said motion, and ordered that the plea be stricken from the files, and rendered judgment by nil dicit for want of a plea, and had the plaintiffs' damages assessed by a jury, and rendered final judgment for the $3,600 damages so assessed. To these several actions and proceedings of the court and to the rendition of judgment the defendant excepted. Upon an appeal to the appellate court the judgment was affirmed. This further appeal was then taken.

Mr. Charles W. Thomas, for appellant:

An assignee of a lessee may destroy all privacy of estate between himself and the lessor by assigning over.

Taylor, Land. & T. § 452; Washington Natural Gas Co. v. Johnson, 123 Pa. 576, 10 Am. St. Rep. 558, and note; Johnson v. Sherman, 15 Cal. 287, 76 Am. Dec. 481; Johnson v. Bates, 16 Jones & S. 180; Tate v. McCormick, 23 Hun, 218; Childs v. Clark, 3 Barb. Ch. 52, 49 Am. Dec. 164; Taylor v. Shum, 1 Bos. & P. 23; Babcock v. Scoville, 56 Ill. 461.

The words "to be performed by said lessee" are merely descriptive of the agreements, and the phrase means simply, "subject to the agreements of the lessee therein mentioned."

Where the lessee assigned his interest in demised premises, by an indenture executed by both parties, "subject to the payment of rent, and the performance of the covenants and agreements reserved and contained in the original lease," it was held that the lessee could not maintain an action of covenant against the assignee in respect to such breach, the words "subject to the payment of rent," etc., being words of qualification, and not of contract.

The want of a warranty in such cases is equivalent to an agreement between the parties that the land conveyed shall remain subject to the encumbrance, and that if the grantee chooses to pay the encumbrance he may, otherwise not.

Messrs. John G. Irwin and W. H. Knome for appellees.

Baker, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

There are some circumstances under which the court may properly strike a plea from the files, and this even when it presents a good defense to the action; and therefore, when the record does not show upon what ground the action of the court was based, it will be presumed in favor of the ruling of the court, that sufficient cause to justify its action was made to appear. Fanning v. Russell, 81 Ill. 398. Here, however, the motion and the proceedings had thereon are preserved in a bill of exceptions, and it is thereby shown that the plea was stricken from the files, and judgment by nil dicit rendered, because, in the opinion of the circuit court, said plea does not answer the declaration, and presents an immaterial issue. It has been held by this court in several cases that if a plea is insufficient in substance or form, the only mode of taking advantage of the defect is by demurrer, and that it is improper to strike the plea from the files. Orne v. Cook, 81 Ill. 288; Johnson v. Freeport & M. River R. Co., 111 Ill. 418. To substitute a motion to strike a pleading from the files in place of a demurrer to such pleading is to abrogate the rules of common law pertaining to pleading and practice, and to introduce a new and dangerous rule of procedure, and one that would tend to deprive parties litigant of the statutory right of amendment. Hitchcock v. Haight, 7 Ill. 604; McClure v. Williams, 65 Ill. 390; and Burlingame v. Turner, 2 Ill. 588, cited by appellees, have reference only to cases where immaterial issues have in fact been formed, not to a case where issue of fact has not been joined upon the pleading which is supposed to be immaterial. In a case such as that last mentioned, a demurrer is the proper tool to work with, whereas, after immaterial issues have been formed, there is no place for a demurrer, and such issues may be stricken from the files and a replender awarded, or judgment nil dicit rendered, or if after verdict, and in a very clear case, judgment non obstante veredicto given. The matter of the appeal herein has been discussed before us just as if a demurrer had been interposed to the plea, and sustained. Since this is so, and since the court below decided the case upon that theory, we deem it advisable to overlook the mere error of practice indicated, and dispose of the appeal upon the footing upon which counsel have submitted it. The declaration alleges the leasing of the premises to the Abbey Coal & Mining Company for the term of twenty-five years, and the covenant of that company to pay an annual royalty of at least $1,200; the entry of that company on the demised premises, the opening of the mine thereon, and the operation of the same by it until August 11, 1886; the assignment by it, at that date, by deed, of the lease and demised property to appellant; and that the appellant "thereupon took possession of the property by said deed conveyed to it, and from thence until the commencement of this suit has had the use, control, and enjoyment thereof," etc.; and that during that time there accrued to appellees, under and by virtue of the provisions of the lease, guaranteed royalties from September 20, 1891, until September 20, 1894, amounting to $3,600, which have not been paid. Where there are express covenants in a lease which runs with the land, such as to pay rent, the lessee is bound to their performance by reason of his being both in privity of contract and privity of estate with the lessor; and the privity of contract continues to the end of the term, but by an assignment of the term he terminates the privity of estate. Between the lessor and the assignee of the term there is privity of estate, and by reason of such privity the assignee is liable for breaches of any express covenant of the lease which runs with the land or term, and which occurs while such privity continues to exist. Tested by these well-settled rules, the declaration states a good cause of action against appellant for the rents or royalties for which suit is brought.

If we assume that the only valid cause of action against appellant that is set up in the declaration is that which we have mentioned and which has for its basis privity of estate, then it necessarily follows that the plea that was interposed by appellant is not justly subject to the charges brought against it of not answering the declaration, and of presenting an immaterial issue, but that, on the contrary, it presents a complete legal defense to the suit. The plea impliedly admits the making of the lease wherein appellees were lessors and the Abbey Coal & Mining Company the lessee; the covenant of said lessee to pay the stated rents or royalties; the assignment by said lessee, by its deed of August 11, 1886, of the lease and demised premises to it, the defendant, and that it thereupon took possession of the mine and property; and pleads by way of defense to the action that it, the defendant, on November 28, 1887, by its instrument in writing of that date, under its corporate seal, did assign and set over to one Jacob Lasurs the lease and all the leasehold interest and estate, and did put said Lasurs into possession of the mine and premises described in the lease; and concludes by traversing the fact alleging in the declaration that it, the defendant, had the use, control, and enjoyment of the premises from September 20, 1891, to September 20, 1894. The rule is that, as the liability of the assignee grows out of privity of estate, and that only, it ceases when that privity ceases to exist; and each successive assignee is liable for only such breaches of covenant as occur while there is privity of estate between him and the lessor. Sexton v. Chicago Storage Co. 129 Ill. 318; Washington Natural Gas Co. v. Johnson, 128 Pa. 576; 2 Taylor, Land. & T. § 452; Wood, Land. & T. §§ 307, 339, 340, 349.

It is claimed by appellees, in their brief, that the question at issue in this cause was adjudicated in some former litigation between the parties to this suit, and that the matter here at issue is res judicata. There are no allegations in the declarations showing a former adjudication in respect to the questions or matters submitted in this suit for the decision of the court, nor is there any replication of res judicata; and so the necessary conclusion must be that no question of res judicata is raised by the record. The principal reliance, however, of appellees, is the claim that the provisions in the deed made on August 11, 1886, by the Abbey Company, lessee, to the defendant, assigning the lease and leasehold property to appellant, amount to a covenant on the part of appellant to pay the accruing rents or royalties for the residue of the term to the lessor in the assigned lease; in other words, that such provision show a privity of contract between appellees and appellant. If this contention is well grounded, then, of course, appellant did not shake off this contractual liability by making an assignment to Lasurs. Such latter assignment, while it would destroy the privity of estate, could not have the effect of obliterating the privity of contract as between appellees and appellant. The material question, then, is, Does the declaration show an express contract on the part of appellant to pay rent for the entire unexpired portion of the term created by the lease? The declaration states that "the said Abbey Coal & Mining Company granted, bargained, sold, assigned, transferred, and set over to the defendant the coal underlying said tracks of land, together with all the rights, privileges, and appurtenances thereunto appertaining or belonging, as the same were conveyed by said lease, and subject to the agreements therein mentioned to be performed by said lessee." The words principally relied on as showing a covenant on the part of appellant are these: "Subject to the agreements therein mentioned to be performed by said lessee." The expression, "to be performed by said lessee," does not refer to the appellant. The Abbey Coal & Mining Company is the only "lessee" mentioned in the declaration or in the deed set forth therein. Said company is manifestly the "lessee" designated. The words, "to be performed by said lessee," then are merely descriptive of the agreements intended to be pointed out by the deed, and the whole clause relied on simply means, "subject to the agreements of the lessee mentioned in the lease."

Do the words, "subject to the agreements in the lease," impose a personal contractual obligation on the assignee? How stand the authorities upon that question? Wolveridge v. Steward, 3 Moore & S. 561, was an action of covenant by the lessee and assignor for non-performance of the covenants in the original lease on the part of the lessee and his assigns to be performed, and which it was contended on the part of the plaintiff that the defendant, according to the legal effect of the assignment from the plaintiff to him, covenanted to perform. The assignment was by an indenture executed by both parties, and was made "subject to the payment of rent and performance of the covenants and agreements reserved and contained in the original lease." The defendant took possession and occupied the premises under this assignment, and before the expiration of the term assigned to a third person. After the second assignment, the lessee was compelled to pay to the lessor rent which the second assignee had suffered to be in arrear. And the said action of covenant prosecuted by the lessee against his immediate assignee, it was held in the exchequer chamber, on error, Lord Chief Justice Denman delivering the opinion, that the immediate assignee was not liable in covenant to the lessee for rent which the latter had been called upon to pay in consequence of the default of the second assignee, and that the words, "subject to the payment of rent," etc., are words of qualification, and not words of contract. In Walker v. Phynick, 5 Pa. 193, it was held, in an opinion delivered by Chief Justice Gibson, that the assignment of land on which a perpetual rent has been reserved, declared in habendum to be "under and subject to the payment of the said rent as the same shall accrue forever," does not create any liability by the assignee to indemnify his assignor for payments of rent accruing after the assignee has assigned over, which were compelled under the personal covenant in the original ground-rent deed; and this whether the assignment be by deed poll or indenture. The particular question now under consideration seems never to have been passed upon directly by this court, but the decisions in cases more or less analogous have been in consonance with the law as held in the cases we have cited. In Comstock v. Hitt, 37 Ill. 542, it was held that taking a deed for premises "subject to" the terms of a title bond, and without any express promise to pay the notes for purchase money mentioned therein, did not subject the grantee to the payment of such notes. It was there said: "Taking a deed 'subject to an outstanding mortgage' creates no personal liability on the grantee to pay off the encumbrance, unless he has specifically agreed so to do, or the amount of the mortgage has been deducted from the purchase price." Hammer v. Johnson, 44 Ill. 192, is to like effect; and so, also, is Fowler v. Fay, 62 Ill. 375. And the later case of Dean v. Walker, 107 Ill. 540, 47 Am. Rep. 467, recognizes the same rule of law, but in the deed there in question was this provision: "Which said two trust deeds, and the indebtedness thereby secured, are hereby assumed to be paid by the said party of the second part;" and this, of course, was held to be an express promise by the grantee to pay the indebtedness, he having accepted the deed with a knowledge of its contents.

Several cases are cited and relied upon by appellees. To the more important of these we will make brief reference. In Wilson v. Marlow, 66 Ill. 385, there was a contract under seal and an assignment of a patent right, and the plaintiff was to receive 5 per cent on the net profits of the business of manufacturing, etc.; and it was held that this amounted to an implied covenant that the business should be carried on if it could be made sufficiently profitable to justify its prosecution. We are unable to see that this decision is applicable to the case at bar. We find nothing in the averments of the declaration that shows that it was the intention of the Abbey Company and of appellant that the latter should not have the power to make a second assignment of the lease, and that appellant, and appellant alone, was to operate the mine for the residue of the term. In Steward v. Wolveridge, 9 Bing. 60, 2 Moore & S. 83, it was held by the court of common pleas that an assignee who takes from a lessee leasehold premises by indenture, "subject to the rent reserved in the lease," is liable in covenant to the lessee for rent which the lessee has been called on by the lessor to pay after the assignee has assigned over. But it largely detracts from the authority of that decision that it was afterwards unanimously reversed in the exchequer chamber, on the ground that the words "subject to," etc., were merely words of qualification, and not of contract. Wolveridge v. Steward, 3 Moore & S. 561. And it also detracts from its weight that the decision is largely based on Burnett v. Lynch, 5 Barn. & C. 589, in which the breaches occurred during the time that the defendant was assignee of the term. Port v. Jackson, 17 Johns. 239, is not an authority in point, for there was in that case a positive and express covenant on the part of the assignee to pay the rent, as it became due, to the lessor. In Campbell v. Shrum, 8 Watts, 60, it was held that the purchase of a tract of land by agreement under seal, "subject to the payment of the purchase money and interest," due to a third person, is a covenant by the vendee to pay such purchase money and interest, upon which an action may be maintained in the name of the vendor for the use of him to whom it is due. The case seems to be in conflict with the rule as announced by this court in Comstock v. Hitt, 37 Ill. 542; Hammer v. Johnson, 44 Ill. 192; Fowler v. Fay, 62 Ill. 375; and Dean v. Walker, 107 Ill. 540, 47 Am. Rep. 467. Besides this, the decision that the words used created a covenant, according to the statement of the same court in Walker v. Phynick, 5 Pa. 193, turned upon the fact that the instrument in which they were employed was an indenture, whereas, both from the statement in the declaration in the case at bar that the words "subject to the agreement," etc., were in "its deed," i. e., the deed of the lessee,—as well as from the rule that the declaration must be taken most strongly against the party whose pleading it is, it appears that the deed of August 11, 1886, here pleaded, was a deed poll.

There are several considerations that lead us to the conclusion that the words "subject to the agreement," etc., used in the deed of August 11, 1886, do not import a covenant on the part of the assignee to personally pay all rents or royalties that may accrue during the term: First. The weight of authority is otherwise. Second. The rule deducible from the decisions of this court in analogous cases is otherwise. Third. As has been suggested in some of the cases, it is the duty of a party who intends by a deed to bind another by a covenant in a former formal instrument to insert such covenant in the deed in such distinct and intelligible terms as that the party to be bound cannot be deceived, and not call upon the courts to infer such a covenant from equivocal words, which were probably understood by one party in a sense different from that sought to be ascribed to them by the other. Fourth. The assignee always takes the estate cum onere,—that is, he takes and holds it subject to the agreements agreed to be performed by the lessee,—and it is difficult to perceive why, upon sound legal principle, the mere expression of this legal implication should create a personal contractual obligation which the legal implication itself would not create. Fifth. It is the public policy of this state that the transmissibility of property should be free and unfettered; and to hold from mere inference, and in the absence of an express and plain covenant, that the assignee of a lease and his heirs will be personally liable for the payment of reserved rents which may accrue perhaps hundreds of years after such assignee has sold and signed the lease to a third person, would tend to make leasehold estates unsalable, and tend to prevent the transfer of them to others.

A further contention of appellees is based upon the averment in the declaration that the grantor in the deed of August 11, 1886, covenanted that the property "was free from all other and prior encumbrances except these above specifically mentioned." The claim is that this exception can be held to refer only to the "agreements in the lease to be performed by the lessee." It is a sufficient answer to this claim that the entire deed is not set out in hac verba in the declaration, and that there is no averment therein that no encumbrances other than "the agreements of the lessee" are specifically mentioned in the deed. The presumptions in this regard must be against the pleader. Besides this, as between the lessee and his assignee, the covenants in the lease constitute no encumbrance whatever. The agreement in the lease to pay rent is an incident of the leasehold estate that was assigned,—one of the elements of the estate itself. The doctrine is that nothing which constitutes a part of the estate, or which, as between the parties, is to be regarded as an incident to which the estate is subject, can be deemed an encumbrance. Dunklee v. Wilton R. Co. 24 N. H. 489; 2 Devlin, Deeds, § 906. But let us assume that "the agreements to be performed by the lessee" are the "encumbrances specifically mentioned." An assignment of a leasehold estate which warrants and defends the assignee against the performance of the agreements of the lease would, indeed, be a curiosity in the way of a legal instrument. The averments of this declaration, however, show that the Abbey Coal & Mining Company did not execute such an instrument, but that by its deed it simply warranted against "encumbrances" other than such "agreements." The absence of a warranty against such "agreements" in legal effect merely left the assigned property, in respect to said "agreements," in its normal condition, and subject, in the hands of the assignee, to the performance of such "agreements;" in other words, there was no change, in this regard, either in the rights of the parties to the deed or in the status of the property which is the subject of the deed. If the words "subject to the agreements therein mentioned to be performed by said lessee," do not impose a personal liability upon the assignee, then it is impossible that the words used in the deed that simply exclude "the agreements of the lessee" contained in the deed from the operation and effect of the covenants of the deed, and leave such "agreements" in statu quo, can work such result.

It follows, from the views we have expressed, that the judgments of the circuit and appellate courts are erroneous. They are reversed. The cause is remanded to the circuit court for further proceedings not inconsistent with this opinion.

Reversed and remanded.

MASSACHUSETTS SUPREME JUDICIAL COURT.

John Oscar TEELE

BISHOP OF DERRY et al.

1. A bequest in trust to purchase a lot and build a chapel to be used forever for public worship under the auspices of the Roman Catholic Church is for a public charitable use.
2. The failure of the purpose of the testatrix in a bequest for the building of a chapel in her native place, which results because the people there are diminishing in number and are too poor to support the chapel, will not justify a diversion of the fund by the cy près doctrine to the repair of a neighboring parish church or for a parish house or the enlargement of a parish graveyard or otherwise for the general benefit of the parish, but the bequest must be held to have failed.

REPORT by the Supreme Judicial Court for Suffolk County for the opinion of the full bench of an action brought to obtain instructions as to the construction and validity of a certain clause in the will of Margaret Bralley, deceased.

The clause of the will as to which instructions were asked directed the trustees to set aside a sum not exceeding $12,000 to be expended by them in the purchase of a lot and the building of a chapel thereon in Carndrine, county Tyrone, Ireland, the title thereof to be vested in the Bishop of that diocese, and his successors in office, and upon the trust that said chapel and lot shall forever be used for the purposes of public worship under the auspices of the Roman Catholic Church.

It proved not practicable to use the money for the purpose of building the chapel because there was not sufficient population in Carndrine to support it and the bishop desired to use the money for repairs on the parish church, which is at Augbayarron 2 or 3 miles distant from Carndrine, to enlarge the graveyard, and to assist in paying for a parish house there.

The residuary legatees under the will claimed that the bequest, if valid, had failed and fallen into the residue which belonged to them.

Further facts appear in the opinion.

Mr. John O. Teele in propria persona.

Messrs. Charles R. Darling and Winfield S. Slocum, for defendants:

The bequest in the will of Margaret Bralley for the purpose of building a chapel at Carndrine is a good charitable gift.

It is no objection that the title to the chapel is directed to be vested in the bishop and his successors in office.

The principle on which the doctrine rests appears to be, that the court treats charity in the abstract as the substance of the gift, and the particular disposition as the mode, so that in the eye of the court the gift, notwithstanding the particular disposition may not be capable of execution, subjects as a legacy which never fails and cannot lapse.

Lyons v. Advocate General of Bengal, L. R. 1 App. Cas. 91.

The use desired by us is a charitable use.

Tudor, Charitable Trusts, 3d ed. p. 6.

The fact that the charity is for the benefit of people in another county is not a valid objection to its maintenance or to the jurisdiction of this court, the testatrix having been domiciled and the will probated here. In case of a foreign charity the court may appoint a trustee here or abroad according to circumstances.

Fellows v. Miner, 119 Mass. 541; Tyssen, Charitable Bequests, chap. 23, Foreign Charities.

The rule is the same in case of private trusts, the residence of the testator and the probate of his will here conferring jurisdiction on our courts, although the beneficiaries and even the trustees are out of the jurisdiction.

The only question specially affecting a foreign charity is whether it is a valid charity by the laws of the country where created, and also of the country where it is to be executed.

Tyssen, Charitable Bequests, chap. 23, p. 289; Fellows v. Miner, 119 Mass. 541.

As to how far the domestic courts will go in regard to administering a foreign charity, and to what extent they will leave the matter to the courts of the foreign country, see the following cases, viz.:

Mr. William M. Noble, for residuary legatees:

The court will not order the trustee to purchase land and erect a chapel as directed in the will.

The court will not substitute its discretion for that of a trustee; far less will it substitute the discretion of the Bishop of Derry; yet the bishop has gone on with the repairs and improvements which he proposes to make this fund pay for, without even consulting the trustee under the will.

Proctor v. Heyer, 122 Mass. 525; Penniman v. Sanderson, 18 Allen, 193.

The court will not substitute another charity in the place of the one intended by the testatrix.

The doctrine of cy près means that where a will discloses a general charitable intent which cannot be literally carried out, it will be carried into effect as nearly as possible.

Where the thing which fails is the very consideration which led to the making of the gift, the gift itself fails and cy près has nothing to do with the case.

Certainly the Bishop of Derry will not contend that this is a gift for the benefit of the Roman Catholic Church, and that it is therefore a gift to general public charity; that would be to argue himself out of court; for, by the rule in this commonwealth, such a gift would be a private charity, and the doctrine of cy près would have no application whatever.

Old South Soc. v. Crocker, 119 Mass. 1, 20 Am. Rep. 299; Atty. Gen. v. Proprietors of Meeting House in Federal Street, 8 Gray, 1; Atty. Gen. v. Clark, 167 Mass. 201.

If, then, in this case, the testatrix had a particular object or a particular charity in mind, rather than a general intention to devote some of her money to public charity, the gift has lapsed; and the question before the court in its last essence is one of construction.

The object of this testatrix, instead of being advanced and improved upon by the proposed administration, would be extinguished.

Equity is slow to enforce trusts of this nature to be administered in foreign countries when the trustee refuses or manifests an indisposition to carry out the intention of the testator.

New v. Bonaker, L. R. 4 Eq. 655; Lyons v. Advocate General of Bengal, L. R. 1 App. Cas. 91.

Morton, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

We think that the bequest to trustees for the purpose of purchasing a lot and building a chapel in Carndrine, Ireland, "to forever be used for purposes of public worship under the auspices of the Roman Catholic Church," was a gift for a public charitable use. Atty. Gen. v. Briggs, 164 Mass. 561, 567; Re Bartlett, Petitioner, 163 Mass. 509, 514; McAlister v. Burgess, 161 Mass. 269, 24 L. R. A. 158; Sears v. Chapman, 158 Mass. 400. The fact that the charity would be administered in a foreign country does not, of itself, render the gift void, and there is nothing to show that it would not be a good public charity by the law of Ireland. Fel'ors v. Miner, 119 Mass. 541, 546; Washburn v. Sewall, 9 Met. 280; Burbank v. Whitney, 24 Pick. 146, 154, 35 Am. Dec. 312; Chamberlain v. Chamberlain, 43 N. Y. 424, 432. Neither does the fact that the bequest is in the nature of a public charity require of itself that the court should frame a scheme to carry out as nearly as may be the purpose of the testatrix, if for any reason that has become impossible of performance in the manner which she has provided. "Assuming that the object is a charity, still there is no universal principle that the testator's particular intentions must be sacrificed by reason of that general object." Bullard v. Shirley, 158 Mass. 559, 560, 12 L. R. A. 110.

The difficulty in this case, and generally in cases like it, is one of construction,—to find out the intention of the testatrix. When that is arrived at, the rules of law which apply seem to be pretty well settled. If it appears from the will that the intention of the testatrix was that her property should be applied to a charitable purpose whose general nature is described so that a general charitable intent can be inferred, then, if by a change of circumstances or in the law it becomes impracticable to administer the trust in the precise manner provided by the testatrix, the doctrine of cy près will be applied, in order that the general charitable intent which the court regards as the dominant one may not be altogether defeated. There are numerous cases in which this rule has been applied. Atty. Gen. v. Briggs, 164 Mass. 561, 567; Sears v. Chapman, 158 Mass. 400; Weeks v. Hobson, 150 Mass. 377, 6 L. R. A. 147; Society for Promoting Theological Education v. Atty. Gen. 185 Mass. 285; Jackson v.

Phillips, 14 Allen, 539; American Academy of Arts & Sciences v. Harvard College, 12 Gray, 582; Church of Jesus Christ of L. D. S. v. United States, 136 U. S. 1, 84 L. ed. 478; Lyons v. Advocate General of Bengal, L. R. 1 App. Cas. 91; Re Maguire, L. R. 9 Eq. 632; Re Prison Charities, L. R. 16 Eq. 140, note; Biscoe v. Jackson, L. R. 35 Ch. Div. 460; Re Campden Charities, L. R. 18 Ch. Div. 810; Re Slevin [1891] 2 Ch. 236. But, if the charitable purpose is limited to a particular object, or to a particular institution, and there is no general charitable intent, then, if it becomes impossible to carry out the object, or the institution ceases to exist before the gift has taken effect, and possibly in some cases after it has taken effect, the doctrine of cy près does not apply, and in the absence of any limitation over or other provision, the legacy lapses. There are many cases which, it has been held, fall within this rule.

Bulard v. Shirley, 153 Mass. 559, 12 L. R. A. 110; Stratton v. Physio-Medical College, 149 Mass. 505, 5 L. R. A. 83; Easterbrooks v. Tillington, 5 Gray, 17; Clark v. Taylor, 1 Drew. 642; Corbyn v. French, 4 Ves. Jr. 418; Russell v. Kellett, 3 Smale & G. 264; Fisk v. Atty. Gen. L. R. 4 Eq. 521; Re Orey, L. R. 29 Ch. Div. 560; Re White, L. R. 33 Ch. Div. 449; Re Rymer [1895] 1 Ch. 19; Carbery v. Cox, 3 Ir. Ch. Rep. 231; Atty. Gen. v. Bishop Chester, 1 Bro. Ch. 444; Cherry v. Mott, 4 Myl. & C. 123. The latest case in this commonwealth in which the doctrine of cy près has been applied is Atty. Gen. v. Briggs, 164 Mass. 561, 567, in which it was held that there was manifest on the part of the testator a general intent to promote education in the neighborhood, and a purpose that the whole town should have the benefit of his bounty, if it could not otherwise be made available to the district which he had designated. In the present case the bequest is not for general religious purposes, nor is there anything to indicate that the object of the testatrix was to benefit the parish as a whole. Her object evidently was to provide a place in the village of Carndrine where the inhabitants could attend religious services, and have the rights of their church administered, without being obliged to go several miles to the parish church at Aughayarron, or to Castlederg, in the neighboring parish. Her purpose was that a lot should be purchased and a chapel built at Carndrine for the benefit of the inhabitants there, not that the bequest should be devoted to repairing the church at Aughayarron or otherwise for the general benefit of the parish. The particularity of the language used forbids, we think, any other construction. Thus she requests her trustees to set aside a sum "to be expended by them in the purchase of a lot and the building of a chapel thereon in my native place, Carndrine; . . . the title thereof to be vested in the bishop, . . . upon the trust that said chapel and lot shall forever be used," etc. Again, she says: "I do not intend to charge my trustees with the responsibility of attending in person to the purchase of the lot and the building of the chapel, but they may make the selection of the lot and contract for the erection of the chapel," etc. Still further she provides that "the amount of money to be expended for such lot and chapel, and the time and manner of its payment, shall be left," etc.

From this it appears, we think, as already observed, that the leading purpose in the mind of the testatrix was the purchase of a lot and the building of a chapel at Carndrine for the benefit of those living there, and that to divert the bequest to repairing the parish church, or for a parish house, or to enlarging the parish graveyard at Aughayarron,—which are the schemes suggested,—would be devoting it to purposes inconsistent and at variance with those designated by the testatrix, and not in furtherance of any general charitable intent on her part. We think that a general intent to advance religion in the parish hardly can be inferred from the purpose thus particularly expressed to build a chapel in Carndrine. It is found that it will be impracticable to carry out the scheme which the testatrix had in mind, and that it will be a wasteful expenditure of the trust fund to purchase a lot and build a chapel at Carndrine. The population is small 'not over one hundred, of whom about four fifths are Roman Catholics, and is diminishing. The people are too poor to support a chapel, and the bishop refuses to assist in maintaining a chapel or supporting a priest, and without his help the people could do neither. The purpose which the testatrix had in view has failed, therefore, and, the case not being one in which the doctrine of cy près properly can be invoked, it follows that the bequest must be held to have failed, and to pass under the residuary clause. See New v. Bonaker, L. R. 4 Eq. 655.

Decree accordingly.

NEW YORK, NEW HAVEN, & HARTFORD RAILROAD COMPANY.

(168 Mass. 306.)

The common-law right of a husband to a right of action for the loss of consortium through an injury to his wife caused by negligence is not taken away by the Massachusetts statutes giving married women the control of their time and actions.

(May 19, 1897.)

EXCEPTIONS by defendant to rulings of the Superior Court for Suffolk County made during the trial of an action to recover damages for loss of society of plaintiff's wife, and expenses incurred for medical attendance upon her by reason of an injury caused by defendant's negligence, which resulted in a verdict in plaintiff's favor. Overruled.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. Benton & Choate, for defendant: By virtue of the legislation in this state a married woman is, "in the view of the law, a distinct and independent person from her husband, not only in respect to her right to own property, but also in respect to her right to use her time for the purpose of earning money on her sole and separate account." Her right to employ her time for the earning of money on her own account is as complete as his.

To say that the husband still has the right to the society and companionship of his wife is to say that he has the right to the control of her time.

To say that his right to enjoy her society is subordinate to her right to employ her time for such labor or business as she sees fit, which right is absolute, exclusive, and as complete as his, is saying nothing less than that his right is no right at all.

The right to recover damages for a loss of "consortium" was given by the common law in three instances, viz.: (1) Where the defendant had enticed the wife away; (2) where the defendant had alienated her affections, or had had criminal conversation with her; (3) where the wife had been injured by the negligence of the defendant.

8 Bl. Com. 189, 140.

Consortium implies an exclusive right against an invader to the wife's affection, companionship, and aid.

Bigelow, Torts, 171; Bennett v. Bennett, 116 N. Y. 584, 6 L. R. A. 558.

The "aid" of Bigelow's definition has been stricken out of the husband's list of assets.

The rights left him are, in substance, to the exclusive possession of her fidelity, affections, and companionship against any invader.

Bigauvette v. Paulet, 184 Mass. 128.

But these rights are not enjoyed by the husband alone. They are mutual. The wife has exactly the same rights to the exclusive possession of her husband's affections and companionship, and to have them undeviled by an "invader," as he has to hers.

Lynch v. Knight, 9 H. L. Cas. 589; Foot v. Card, 58 Conn. 1, 6 L. R. A. 829; Bennett v. Bennett, 116 N. Y. 584, 6 L. R. A. 558; Seaver v. Adams, 66 N. H. 142; Mehrhoff v. Mehrhoff, 26 Fed. Rep. 18; Jaynes v. Jaynes, 39 Hun, 40; Bigelow, Torts, 171, note 3; Cooley, Torts, 2d ed. 267, note 2.

Mere negligence cannot reach or affect those mutual rights which spring from the marriage contract. It does not rob the husband of his wife's affections. It does not interfere with the exclusiveness of his right to conjugal intercourse with her. It does not entice her from her home, or deprive him of the right to exclude everyone else from the enjoyment of her society as a wife. All these things she can deprive him of in the exercise of her own recently acquired liberty.

Southwick v. Southwick, 97 Mass. 327, 93 Am. Dec. 95.

It was always held that the gist of the action which the husband had was per quod consortium amisit, and the writ when first granted was so framed.

Guy v. Liressey, Cro. Jac. 501; Hyde v. Scysson, Cro. Jac. 538.

Expense incurred in curing the wife was held to be incidental to and aggravation of the real injury. But without the existence of that for which, if injured, an action was given, expenses alone gave no ground for suit.

Hall v. Hollander 4 Barn. & C. 660.

Mr. J. E. Cotter, for plaintiff:

The married women's acts have not extinguished the common-law per quod remedy of a husband.

It would be illogical to hold that a husband remains responsible for expenses occasioned by an injury to his wife, and that he may have exclusive enjoyment of her time and society through her voluntary choice, but that he is remediless if subjected to the one and deprived of the other by the act of a tortfeasor.

The testimony as to the nature of the consequences of the injury to the wife, taken in connection with the nature of her prior health and employment, was ample to warrant a finding that the husband had been substantially, if not entirely, deprived of his wife's society and services.

Southwick v. Southwick, 97 Mass. 327, 93 Am. Dec. 95.

Allen, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

In Bigauvette v. Paulet, 184 Mass. 123, 45 Am. Rep. 307, a husband's action for loss of consortium with his wife was held to be maintainable, although there was no loss of service or payment of expenses in consequence thereof. And in Bennett v. Bennett, 116 N. Y. 584, 6 L. R. A. 558, it is said that the basis of the husband's action for loss of consortium is his right to the conjugal society of his wife, and that it is not necessary that there should be proof of any pecuniary loss, or loss of service. The present case was tried with an action brought by the plaintiff's wife, and the same jury fixed the damages in both cases. The defendant took exceptions in this case, but none in the action brought by her. The jury were instructed that the division of the rights to recover which by law is made between the husband and the wife does not, in any sense, increase the aggregate right of recovery, and that the damages which are to be divided between the husband and the wife should not, in the aggregate, exceed the damages which the wife, if unmarried, would be entitled to recover; with the qualification, however, that one additional element should be considered, namely, the loss of consortium by the husband. The defendant contends that now an action will not lie for loss of consortium, or, at least, that it will not in case of an injury to her through negligence, and that the incurring of expenses will not alone give a ground of action. It might be sufficient, to dispose of this case, to say that the plaintiff was bound to support his wife, and that the expenses incurred by him appear to have exceeded the amount of the verdict, and that, therefore, the defendant's exceptions should be overruled; but, in view of the ruling at the trial allowing the jury to take into account the plaintiff's loss of consortium, and of the defendant's request that the correctness of this ruling should be determined, we proceed to consider it. By the common law it is quite clear that a husband might maintain an action in his own name alone for an injury to his wife which resulted in his loss of consortium with her; as, for example, for an injury caused by an assault and battery upon her by medical or surgical malpractice, or by other negligence. Lyde v. Seyssor, Cro. Jac. 538; Guy v. Lusy, 2 Rolle, 51; Russell v. Corne, 3 Ld. Raym. 1081; Dix v. Brookes, 1 Strange, 61; Smith v. Hizon, 2 Strange, 977; 2 Rolle. Abr. 556; Hale, Analysis of the Law, 40; 8 Bl. Com. 140; 1 Chitty, Pl. 83; [Higgins v. Butcher], Yelv. (Met. ed.) 89; Baker v. Bolton, 1 Campb. 498; Carey v. Berkshire R. Co. 1 Cush. 475, 478, 48 Am. Dec. 616; Barnes v. Hurd, 11 Mass. 69; Laughlin v. Eaton, 54 Me. 156; Hopkins v. Atlantic & St. L. R. Co. 86 N. H. 9, 14, 73 Am. Dec. 287; Lewis v. Babcock, 18 Johns. 443; Matteson v. New York C. R. Co. 85 N. Y. 487, 91 Am. Dec. 67; Jones v. Utica & B. R. Co. 40 Hun, 349 (a case much like the present); Berger v. Jacobs, 21 Mich. 215; Hyatt v. Adams, 16 Mich. 180; Long v. Morrison, 14 Ind. 595, 77 Am. Dec. 72; Nixon v. Ludlam, 50 Ill. App. 273; Menchirter v. Hatten, 42 Iowa, 288, 20 Am. Rep. 618; Mowry v. Chaney, 48 Iowa, 609; Smith v. St. Joseph, 55 Mo. 456, 17 Am. Rep. 660. The contention of the defendant, therefore, must rest entirely on the ground that the husband has lost this right of consortium by reason of the legislation of this commonwealth increasing the rights of married women. Harmon v. Old Colony R. Co. 165 Mass. 100, 80 L. R. A. 638. But there has been no substantial change in the statutes upon this subject, since the decision in Bigaouette v. Paulet. Notwithstanding the progress of legislation in giving to married women the control of their time and actions, this right of the husband is not destroyed. The unity and identity of interest which by the common law existed between husband and wife have been impaired. Butler

v. Ives, 139 Mass. 202. They are not, however, entirely done away with. The husband's right to compel his wife to work for him is abridged, but he still has a right to her society and assistance, which is different in character and degree from that which other people have, or which she is at liberty to give to them. By marriage, both husband and wife take upon themselves certain duties and obligations towards each other, in sickness and health, which it cannot be supposed that the legislature has intended wholly to uproot. A married woman may now perform any labor or services on her sole and separate account, as her husband may; nevertheless each owes certain duties to the other which are not annulled by the statutes. Menchirter v. Hatten, 42 Iowa, 288, 20 Am. Rep. 618. These duties are included in the word "consortium;" but the extent of these duties, or of the right of consortium, need not now be determined. The only question presented to us is whether the presiding justice was right in allowing the jury to consider at all the loss of consortium. It is argued by the defendant that, if a husband has a right to recover for the loss of consortium through an injury caused by negligence, a wife also would have the same right, by virtue of the existing statutes, in case of such an injury to her husband; and that this has never been held, or even contended for. She has no such right at common law, but whether she has by statute we do not now consider. The question has been considered elsewhere, but the decisions are not in harmony.

Exceptions overruled.

Peter GRANEY and Wife, Repts.,
v.

ST. LOUIS, IRON MOUNTAIN, & SOUTHERN RAILWAY COMPANY, Appt.

(.....Mo.....)

1. An action for negligence in running a train at a rate of speed prohibited by ordinance over a crossing at which there do not appear to have been any gates or watchmen is not defeated by the subsequent substitution of an ordinance which makes the same limitation except when gates and a watchman are provided.
2. Negligence may be the proximate cause of an injury which directly results therefrom, although the particular consequences were unusual and could not ordinarily have been foreseen.
3. The negligence of a boy twelve years old in standing so near a passing train that he is drawn under it by a current of air is a question for the jury, and cannot be declared as a matter of law.

4. Standing so near a passing train that there is danger of being drawn under it by a current of air is negligence although the person does not stand near enough to be struck by the train.

5. Evidence of the effect of air upon mail sacks thrown from running trains is inadmissible on the question of the effect upon a boy weighing 65 pounds standing near a passing train.

APPEAL by defendant from a judgment of the Circuit Court for St. Louis County in favor of plaintiffs in an action brought to recover damages for the alleged negligent killing of plaintiffs' minor son. Reversed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Macfarlane, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

This is an action by plaintiffs, who are husband and wife, to recover the statutory damages of $5,000, for the death of their minor son, James Graney, caused, as alleged, by the negligence of the employees of defendant in running one of its freight trains in the city of St. Louis. The petition charges in substance that on the 18th day of January, 1891, there were in force three valid ordinances in the city of St. Louis,—one prohibiting any car or cars or locomotive propelled by steam power to be run at a rate of speed exceeding 6 miles per hour; another requiring such locomotive to ring a bell constantly while running within the city limits; and the third imposing a penalty for violation of either of the other two. The petition then charges the circumstances under which the son of plaintiffs was killed, substantially as follows: The said James, the infant son of plaintiffs, was on the 18th day of January, 1891, standing upon the crossing of Dorcas street, in the city of St. Louis, alongside the track of defendant's railway, and at a sufficient and proper distance away from said track, and away from the locomotive and cars operated by defendant, when the servants of defendant, without warning, recklessly, negligently, and at a speed prohibited by an ordinance of said city, ran a train of freight cars over said track, by reason of which their son fell and was sucked under the wheels of the cars, and was thereby killed. The only negligence charged is the violation of these ordinances. Defendant answered by a general denial and a plea of contributory negligence. It also averred that said ordinances regulating the speed of trains had been repealed, since the death of James Graney, by an ordinance limiting the rate of speed to 20 miles per hour. On the trial the ordinances pleaded were read in evidence. It was admitted that James Graney was killed on the 18th of January, 1891, by being run over by a train of freight cars operated by defendant, and that he was the minor son of plaintiffs. It was shown that, on the date mentioned, defendant controlled and operated a railroad, a portion of which was located in the city of St. Louis. It has two tracks, running north and south, which cross Dorcas street at right angles. This street runs east and west through the city. On Sunday afternoon, January 18, 1891, James Graney, then eleven years and nine months old, and four other boys, who were from one to two years older, came down Dorcas street from the west, intending to cross the railroad of defendant. When close to the track, a train of twenty-three freight cars, drawn by an engine, came onto the crossing from the south in front of them. The engine bell was not ringing, and the train was running 20 or 25 miles per hour. The boys stopped at various distances from the track, to await the passage of the train. James Graney stood between the two tracks, 2 or 3 feet from the west rail of the east track, upon which the train was passing. When about half or two thirds of the train had passed, he was seen to whirl around, and fall upon the ground, and roll over. In rolling, his legs got upon the rail, and the cars passed over them. From this injury he died, on the next day.

These are substantially the facts proved on the trial. There was no material conflict except as to the speed of the train and giving the signals. No witness gives the speed of the train at less than 6 miles per hour. The other boys who were with deceased testified to a speed of over 20 miles per hour. At the close of all the evidence, defendant's counsel asked the court to give an instruction in the nature of a demurrer to the evidence, which was refused. The court gave each party a number of instructions, and refused some asked by defendant. No. 7, given at request of plaintiff, is as follows: "The court instructs the jury that plaintiffs' minor son, James Graney, was entitled on the 18th day of January, 1891, to pass over and upon Dorcas street, where the tracks of defendant cross the said street, if the jury find from the evidence that said Dorcas street was a public traveled street of the city of St. Louis, and to stop at any place upon said street away from the track of said defendant on which it was operating its train; and if the jury find from the evidence that said James Graney was away from the said track of said defendant a reasonably sufficient distance, so that he was not struck by the locomotive or train, or by any motion or other agency caused by the approach of said train, and the jury further find that the said James Graney, without any fault or negligence on his part, was drawn in by the air caused by the velocity of said train being operated in excess of 6 miles an hour, and by that cause alone was injured, by having his feet drawn in and under the said train, and that such injury was the cause of his death, on the 19th day of January, 1891, then the jury will find for the plaintiffs." There were a verdict and a judgment for plaintiffs, and defendant appealed.

1. Counsel for appellant insist, in the first place, that the repeal of the ordinance in force at the date of the accident defeats the right of action grounded upon negligence in running the train at a rate of speed prohibited by the ordinance. The argument is based upon the well-recognized principle of law that "a right to have one's controversies determined by existing rules of evidence is not a vested right," and, "like other rules affecting the remedy, they must therefore, at all times, be subject to modification and control by the legislature." Cooley, Const. Lim. 450; Coe v. Ritter, 86 Mo. 282. What the effect of a repeal of the existing ordinance of the city would be in making proof of negligence which rests entirely upon its violation might be an interesting question. But an examination of this record does not show that the ordinance in question was repealed in respect to the limitation on the rate of speed of trains by the subsequent ordinance passed by the city. The ordinance in force at the date of the accident is known as § 28 of article 4 of chapter 31 of the Revised Ordinances of the city of St. Louis, and reads: "It shall not be lawful within the limits of the city of St. Louis for any car, cars, or locomotives propelled by steam power, to run at a speed exceeding 6 miles per hour." Exceptions are made, which have no application to the train by which the death of the boy was occasioned. The subsequent ordinance amends the Revised Ordinances of the city by striking out §§ 1234, 1235, 1236, 1237, and 1238 of article 5 of chapter 31, and inserting five new sections in lieu thereof. The first of these requires railroad corporations to maintain gates at street crossings, and keep a watchman to operate the same. The next three sections provide for enforcing compliance with the first. The fifth, upon which defendant relies, is as follows: "It shall not be lawful within the limits of the city of St. Louis for any person, association, or corporation to run any engine, car, or train of cars propelled by steam power at a rate of speed exceeding 6 miles per hour over, along, or across any cross or intersecting street, avenue, or road, which is now or may hereafter be used for wagon travel, if such person, association, or corporation shall have failed to comply with a notice from the street commissioner, specified in § 1234. But after compliance therewith, it shall be lawful for any person, association, or corporation to run its engines, car, or train of cars at a rate of speed not exceeding 20 miles per hour." Now, it is evident that the prohibition in respect to the speed of trains contained in the original ordinance was continued in force until the railroad corporation complied with the requirements of § 1234 of the substituted ordinance. There was no proof that defendant maintained a gate or kept a watchman at the crossing of Dorcas street. Indeed, the inference may be readily drawn from the evidence that the requirements of the substituted ordinance had not been complied with, and defendant was therefore limited to a speed of 6 miles per hour. From what is said, we do not wish to be understood as expressing or intimating an opinion as to what effect an absolute repeal of the original ordinance would have had upon its admissibility as evidence in proof of negligence. According to defendant's contention, the substituted ordinance furnished the evidence.

2. Was the demurrer to the evidence properly denied? First, was defendant's negligence the proximate cause of the injury? Under the ordinance in force in the city of St. Louis, defendant was negligent in running the train at a rate of speed in excess of 6 miles per hour. The negligence being established, defendant is liable for all the consequences directly resulting therefrom, though the particular injury might not have been anticipated. In case the negligence is admitted or otherwise proved, and the injurious consequences are immediate, and flow directly from the negligent act, the person guilty of the act will not be excused for the reason that the particular consequences were unusual, and could not ordinarily have been foreseen. Proof of negligence and of injury directly resulting therefrom makes, prima facie, a case for damages. 16 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law, p. 423. It is well known from common observation and experience that a moving train or other body creates a movement of the air near it in the same direction. The force of the current of the air is increased with the increased velocity of the moving object. A rapidly moving train carries the air along with it with such velocity and force as to tend to move or overthrow one standing very near to the track. F. E. Nipher, professor of physics of Washington University, of St. Louis, Missouri, testified as a witness for plaintiff. He stated that he had occupied the position of professor of physics for twenty years; had frequently observed the motion of bodies through the air; had experimented on the effect upon the air of running railroad trains. A train of twenty cars, running at 6 miles per hour, has no appreciable effect upon the air, but the effect is very much greater when the speed is 20 miles per hour. The witness was asked what effect the air, struck by a running train, would have upon bodies standing close to it. He answered: "The body that is very close to the moving train as the train approaches—the front part of the train—the body would have a tendency to be pushed away from the front part of the locomotive by the parting of the air, but along towards the latter part of the train the air is carried along with the train, and a person standing near a car or train like that the air would have a tendency to draw along with it. It would have a tendency to produce its rotation on the party; that is to say, the side of the party towards the train would be whirled around, and carried with and towards the train. I have always felt this current of air while standing near a moving train in making such tests."

Q. Now, suppose a person, a small boy, weighing about 60 pounds, was standing near a train, running at 20 miles an hour; what would you say would be the effect of the velocity of the air created by that train on that boy?

A. The effect of that would be to upset him, perhaps, and in doing so, if he were to fall, it would produce a whirling of his body, which would roll him towards the train.

Q. Could that occur if the train was running at 6 miles an hour?

A. No, sir; there would be no effect of that kind produced on the boy.

The witness gave it as his opinion that the boy might have been thrown down and rolled under the wheel by force of the air, without "the boy striking the train, or the train striking the boy;" also, that the air would give to the body a rotary motion towards the cars. We have no right to disregard this evidence as being contrary to known laws. The evidence tends to prove that James Graney was standing within 2 or 3 feet of the track as the train passed him. When about half the train had passed, he was observed to turn and fall in the direction in which the train was moving, and to roll over on the ground, his legs thereby going upon the rail. An inference may be reasonably drawn from these facts that he was thrown down by the force of the current of air caused by the unlawful speed at which the train was run. We have, therefore, evidence tending to prove negligence in operating the train, and that the death of the boy was the immediate consequence thereof. These facts, if found by the jury, would authorize a recovery, unless negligence can be attributed to the boy in voluntarily standing so near the running train as to be thrown down by the wind created thereby.

3. Deceased saw the train, and standing, as he was, by the side of it, knew its rate of speed was unlawful, or at least he was not entitled to rebut the presumption that it was running less than 6 miles per hour. If an injury had been suffered by a person sui juris in the same circumstances, and for the same cause, we could not hesitate to declare his conduct in standing so near the track such negligence as would preclude a recovery. But a boy of twelve years is only required to exercise the degree of care commensurate with his intelligence, experience, and knowledge, and is only chargeable with contributory negligence according to the same rule. Whether, in a particular case, his concurring negligence will defeat a recovery, is generally, but not always, a question of fact, to be determined by the jury. Where it appears conclusively that a boy of such age has knowledge of the danger of doing an act and sufficient intelligence to avoid it, and nevertheless voluntarily does it, and is injured thereby, he will be chargeable with contributory negligence, as a matter of law. The fact that he was reckless in the face of the danger should no more excuse him than the same characteristic would excuse an adult person. Payne v. Chicago & A. R. Co. 186 Mo. 562; Spillane v. Missouri P. R. Co. 135 Mo. 414; Ridenhour v. Kansas City Cable R. Co. 102 Mo. 270, and 288. James Graney was eleven years, nine months old at the date of his death, and was small for his age, weighing only about 65 pounds. The record gives us no information in respect to his intelligence, knowledge of running trains, or physical activity. That he was indiscreet can be readily inferred from his conduct on the occasion of his death. The question then is, whether, in the circumstances under which the boy met his death, we can declare, as a matter of law, that he was guilty of contributory negligence. In order to declare this, as a conclusion of law, we must presume from his age alone that he was capable of understanding the danger to which he exposed himself. It has been held that a boy between eleven and twelve years of age will be presumed to know the danger he incurs in going upon a railroad track immediately in front of a running train. Masser v. Chicago, R. I. & P. R. Co. 63 Iowa, 602; Tucker v. New York C. & H. R. R. Co. 124 N. Y. 308.

But the capacity to know and the ability to avoid danger are generally to be determined by the character of the danger, and the precaution necessary to be taken in order to avoid it. While a boy twelve years of age may well be presumed to know the obvious danger of going upon a railroad track before a running train, he might not have knowledge of the danger of standing so near the track while a train is passing. We do not think it conclusively appears from the mere evidence of the age of deceased that his knowledge was sufficient to justify the court in declaring, as a matter of law, that he knew of the danger of his negligent act, and the jury was properly left to determine whether, in the circumstances, contributory negligence should be imputed to him. We are of the opinion that the trial court did not commit error in refusing the demurrer to the evidence.

4. We are of the opinion that the seventh instruction given at the request of plaintiff is misleading, and improperly declares the measure of care required of one standing beside a railroad track while a train is running over it. As will be seen, the instruction in effect tells the jury, as a matter of law, that deceased was not negligent if he stood a sufficient distance from the track to avoid being struck by the locomotive and train passing upon it. Thus, the instruction ignores the very cause which produced the injury, namely, the disturbance of the air. A prudent person would stand far enough from the track to avoid the dangerous effect of the wind produced by the train. Whether a boy could stand nearer a train than common prudence would dictate in the case of an adult person, and avoid the effect of his conduct if injured, would depend upon whether contributory negligence could be imputed to him. The degree of care required of a boy is not different from that required of a man if the former is chargeable with contributory negligence at all. The act of deceased in voluntarily taking a position so near the train as to be thrown down by the disturbance of the air was a negligent act, and the jury might properly have been so instructed. He had no right to presume that the train was running at less speed than 6 miles per hour when he could see that it was moving much faster. His companions knew that it was running over 20 miles per hour, for they all testified to the excessive rate of speed. The question then, was, whether deceased had knowledge and understanding of the danger he incurred in taking a position within 2 or 3 feet of this train, and trying to stand there while it passed him.

5. Two witnesses, Lavin and Culvert were called as experts, and were permitted to give their opinion as to the effect the current of air produced by a freight train running at the rate of 20 miles per hour would have upon a boy weighing 65 pounds, standing within 2 or 3 feet of it. These witnesses were allowed to detail in chief to the jury their observations of the effect of the air upon mail sacks thrown from running trains. This evidence was entirely irrelevant to any issue on trial. It did not even correctly illustrate the question in issue. An object thrown from a train while in motion is carried forward by the momentum of the train, as well as by the current of the air, and the effect of the current on them might not be the same as that produced upon a stationary object. The court should not have permitted these witnesses, on examination in chief, to detail to the jury the result of these experiments.

Judgment reversed, and cause remanded.

NEW JERSEY COURT OF ERRORS AND APPEALS.

TRENTON PASSENGER RAILWAY COMPANY, Pf. in Err.,v.
Charles S. COOPER.SAME, Pf. in Err.,v.
Samuel M. BENNETT.

(.....N. J.....)

1. Escape of electricity from a street railway to the injury of a horse being driven on a public street is presumptive proof of negligence in the operation of the railway. Res ipsa loquitur.

2. Words spoken by a driver in the effort to control a runaway horse are admissible in evidence as a part of the res gestæ on the trial of an action for damages for injuries resulting from the frightening of a horse. Evidence of previous experience of the driver in case of electric shock to a horse was competent, not to prove the fact of a shock in the case at hand, but to account for the driver's words and conduct.

3. Evidence legal for some purpose cannot be excluded because a jury may erroneously use it for another purpose. The defendant's protection against this is to ask for cautionary instruction.

4. The admission of a leading question cannot be reviewed on error.

WRITS of error to the Circuit Court for Mercer County to review judgments in favor of plaintiffs in actions brought to recover damages for personal injuries alleged to have been caused by defendant's negligence. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Mr. James Buchanan for plaintiff in error.

Messrs. John H. Backes and G. D. W. Vroom, for defendants in error:

Parties dealing with this dangerous article are held to the highest degree of care. Whether or not this was done by the defendant was for the jury.

Thompson, Electricity, 64.

The exclamation made by the plaintiff, Cooper, to Bennett, when the horse lunged and kicked, "He has got a shock, Sam; catch hold," was a part of the res gestæ, and as such was admissible in evidence.

The evidence of Bennett, that the plaintiff, Cooper, made such remark to him, was admissible as part of the res gestæ.

Collins, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

These two causes were argued together upon identical bills of exception and assignments of error, the original actions having been tried together in the Mercer circuit. The actions were based upon alleged negligence in the lawful operation by means of electricity of a street railway in the city of Trenton. In such operation an electric current was conducted through rails laid on the street, the ends of the rails being fastened together with metallic ties by a process called in the declaration and testimony "bonding." The negligence averred was insufficient or defective bonding, permitting the escape of electricity. In one of the actions the result averred was injury to a valuable horse owned and being driven by the plaintiff Cooper, and in the other personal injury to the plaintiff Bennett, who was Cooper's hostler and was riding with him. The horse ran away, and both men were thrown from the carriage. The plaintiffs recovered damages, and the judgments have been removed by writs of error to this court.

Error is first assigned upon refusal to nonsuit. The contention is that, as the averments of negligence were limited to the bonding of the rails, the plaintiffs were obliged to point out and establish some particular defect or insufficiency in such bonding. I do not assent to this view. It would have been sufficient to aver that electricity was, through negligence, permitted to escape from the rails; but, as it appeared in the case that such escape was only possible at the ends of the rails, it was a necessary conclusion that, if it occurred, it must have been due to insufficient or defective bonding. It must be assumed that with proper and sufficient bonds the rails would have carried a current of electricity with safety to horses stepping upon them. Otherwise the operation of a railway in a public street by means of such a current passing through its rails was ipso facto a nuisance. No legislation has authorized such an infringement on the rights of the public in a highway. If, therefore, electricity did escape from the rails, that fact was presumptive proof of negligence. The case comes clearly within the bounds set by this court for the right of a plaintiff to say, "Res ipsa loquitur." Bahr v. Lombard, 53 N. J. L. 233. Of course, proof of a latent defect or of a break in a bond, of which the managers of the railway could not with due diligence have learned, might rebut the presumption of negligence, but no such proof appeared in the plaintiff's case. Assuming that there was proof tending to show that electricity did escape from the company's rails and affect the horse, it was the duty of the trial judge to require a defense. There was proof sufficient to go to the jury of such escape and shock. The horse, previously docile, and accustomed to the city streets, was being driven across the railway track. Immediately after stepping on a rail, he stopped, shook, quivered, and then plunged forward, and ran so violently as to overcome all efforts to restrain him. A subsequent examination by a veteri-state. Its organization, corporate functions, who shall become members, what are their rights as members, are all questions for New Jersey courts, because questions of local law. Therefore they require local administration. The contract with the Edison Company, the bill assumes, granted the exclusive use of the conduits to that company, which was not within the corporate power of the Penn Company to grant. Assuming that the grant was exclusive, what was the scope of the corporate powers conferred by the state of New Jersey? We must at once turn to the local law of New Jersey for answer. Next it is asked that a decree be made that bids be invited for the extension and use of its conduits; next, that the management shall be declared collusive and fraudulent, and be placed in the control of a master to be appointed by the court. This involves the corporate management of a foreign corporation by a Pennsylvania court. It seems to us it would be without warrant in either reason or authority. While visitatorial and remedial powers are conferred upon our courts over corporations of this state, and they can, under certain circumstances, properly exercise these powers, as to foreign corporations it has been directly decided otherwise. In Morris v. Sterens, 6 Phila. 488, Justice Sharswood, sitting at nisi prius, held that a stockholders' bill could not be maintained against a foreign corporation mainly on the ground that to do so would lead to a conflict of jurisdiction. He refers to Judge King's decision in Bank of Virginia v. Adams, 1 Pars. Sel. Eq. Cas. 534, where it was held that even a creditors' bill to compel payment of subscription to stock was not sustained; much less would a stockholders' bill lie, for the Pennsylvania resident has no right to call upon the courts of his own state to protect him from the consequences of a voluntary membership in a foreign corporation. By the very act of membership, he intrusted his money to the control of an organization owing its existence to, and governed by, the laws of another state.

It is argued by appellants that the visible, tangible property of a foreign corporation situate within this state confers local jurisdiction, and therefore, as the conduits are in Philadelphia, our courts have jurisdiction. Without doubt, courts of equity in Pennsylvania have, under our act of assembly of April 6, 1859, jurisdiction to enjoin unlawful acts by such corporations; to enforce performance of contracts in this state with third parties; in short, have general jurisdiction in equity; but they have no jurisdiction as to their internal management. What constitutes internal management is well defined by Stone, J., in North State Copper & Gold Min. Co. v. Field, 64 Md. 154: "Where the act complained of affects the complainant solely in his capacity as a member of the corporation, whether it be as stockholder, director, president, or other officer, and is the act of the corporation, whether acting in stockholders' meeting or through its agents, the board of directors, that then such action is the management of the internal affairs of the corporation, and in case of a foreign corporation, our courts will not take jurisdiction." Here the plaintiffs (stockholders) accuse the corporate management of disregard of the rights of the whole body of stockholders, for whom the corporation is trustee, in making unwise and reckless contracts which depreciate and render valueless their stock. The wrong complained of is not from the violation of a contract with them, but want of fidelity to duty in their fiduciary relation springing from the nature of the organization. In substance, the averment is that, at the office of the company in the state of New Jersey, the management, in violation of their official duty, entered into a contract to be performed in Pennsylvania, whereby the stockholders suffer. This, plainly, strikes at the internal management of the company. The existence of the wrong must be ascertained, and the remedy applied, according to the laws of the domicile.

The decree is affirmed.

2. An ordinance prohibiting the establishment of a steam shoddy machine or and abate nuisances are treated of in a note to Grossman v. Oakland (Or.) 26 L. R. A. 593.

The question of the power of municipalities over nuisances affecting buildings and other obstructions will be found in note to Evansville v. Miller (Ind.) ante, 161.

A note to the cases of Cape May v. Cape May, D. R. & S. P. R. Co. (N. J.) post, —; Hagerstown v. Whitmer (Md.) post, —, and State v. Clarke (Conn.) post, —, shows the power of such authorities over nuisances on highways and waters.

Cases of nuisances relating to the use and sale of intoxicating liquors, and other nuisances affecting public morals, decency, peace, or good order, and the power of municipalities over the same, will form the subject of another note, as will also the question of prescription in cases of nuisances, and that of the power of a court of equity to interfere on behalf of the municipal authorities to restrain a nuisance.

Nuisances affecting public safety, health, and personal comfort and the municipal power thereover, form the subject of note to Harrington v. Providence (R. I.) ante, 305, which also treats of the keeping of explosives and the use of electricity and steam.

As bearing upon the power to license a particular business, see State v. Conlon (Conn.) 31 L. R. A. 55.

The subject of this note is confined exclusively to the question of municipal control over, and the regulation or abatement of, nuisances arising from any particular trade or business, and does not treat of the subject of private remedies for such nuisances.

I. In general.

The right to use property in the prosecution of any business which is not dangerous to others, nor injurious nor offensive to persons within its vicinity, is one of the legal attributes of the ownership of property of which the owner cannot be deprived by the arbitrary declaration of any law of the state or municipal ordinance, nor can the right of any person to engage in any useful occupation not a nuisance per se at such place as he may choose for that purpose be denied by any law or ordinance. Re Hong Wah, 82 Fed. Rep. 623, 626.

Upon this question it has been said that, as a city cannot declare that to be a nuisance which is not one it must confine its prohibitory action to fixing the locality of any business to future erections or establishments, and when anything creates an actual nuisance it may be reached and punished without reference to its duration, and its continuance as a nuisance may be adequately prevented. Wreford v. People, 14 Mich. 41.

A city cannot declare a particular business a nuisance in a summary way and at its pleasure. Yates v. Milwaukee, 77 U. S. 10 Wall. 505, 19 L. ed. 986.

An existing business cannot be put an end to so long as it is not a nuisance in fact. Wreford v. People, 14 Mich. 41.

In Ruff v. Phillips, 50 Ga. 131, 183, it is said, to make the thing a nuisance it ought to be of such a character as will hurt or annoy, in the legal sense of those words, ordinary people, not nice, susceptible sickly people. In this case it was sought to abate the defendant's warehouse as a place of storage for commercial fertilizers, but the case was of a private nature.

The legislature under the police power may regulate, or even prohibit, the carrying on of any business in such a manner and in such a place as to become dangerous or detrimental to the health, morals, or good order of the community. People v. Rosenberg, 138 N. Y. 410, 415.

In order to constitute a public nuisance in conducting a business in a populous city it is not sufficient to show that its exercise is merely disagreeable, but there must be an annoyance calculated to interrupt the public in the reasonable enjoyment of their property. Proust's Case, 4 City Hall Rec. 87.

It is not necessary that a trade should be so injurious to health as to constitute a public nuisance in order to have it restrained; the mere offensiveness to the senses making the enjoyment of life uncomfortable may destroy a vast amount of property in the neighborhood. Howard v. Lee, 3 Sandf. 88 L. R. A.

PETITION for a writ of habeas corpus to procure the release of petitioner from custody to which he had been committed for alleged violation of a city ordinance restricting the limits within which certain kinds of machinery could be erected. Denied.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

231, 233. This was a case of a private person seeking to restrain a soap-boiling establishment.

In Kinney v. Koopman (Ala.) 37 L. R. A. 497, it is said if an occupation be lawful, and by care and precaution it can be conducted without danger or inconvenience to another, the occupation is not per se a nuisance; and if an occupation or business becomes a nuisance it is because of a want of proper care or precaution. In this case the defendant was held liable for keeping gunpowder contrary to § 4093 of the Alabama Criminal Code of 1893.

The pursuit of a noxious trade is lawful so long as it does not interfere with the rights of the public, but when it does so interfere with their superior rights it becomes illegal, and no length of time can sanctify it, as its exercise is a daily renewal of the offense. Ashbrook v. Com. 1 Bush, 139, 89 Am. Dec. 616.

Manufactures, lawful in themselves, may become nuisances if erected in parts of towns where they cannot but greatly incommode the inhabitants and destroy their health. Meeker v. Van Rensselaer, 15 Wend. 397.

Even works that are nuisances per se may be lawfully carried on in a convenient place, as in a place remote from habitation and public localities; and when such a business is thus established in a convenient place remote from dwellings and public works, even though it may have been carried on for many years, yet when the place becomes inconvenient by reason of public roads being laid so near that it becomes materially offensive upon them, or when other business is established in the vicinity which is not a nuisance and is injuriously affected thereby, being offensive to those who work there or come there to trade, or when numerous dwellings are erected in its vicinity to which it is a serious annoyance,—it in law becomes a public nuisance, and must yield to the public necessity and to the demands of the public interest, notwithstanding that it has been carried on there for more than a century, for no length of time works a prescription for a public nuisance or other public offense. Com. v. Miller, 139 Pa. 77, 83.

In Woodyear v. Schaefer, 57 Md. 1, 10, 40 Am. Rep. 419, it is said that the right to pure air is held to be a natural right and as incident to the enjoyment of land, and its sensible pollution by the exercise of a noxious trade whereby the comfortable enjoyment of property is diminished is a nuisance.

The right to pure air is in one sense an absolute one for all persons having the right to life and health, and such a contamination of the air as is injurious to health cannot be justified; but in another sense it is relative and depends upon one's surroundings, and therefore people living in great cities that are sustained by manufacturing enterprises must necessarily be subject to many annoyances and positive discomforts by reason of noise, dust, smoke, and odors more or less disagreeable produced by and resulting from the business that supports the city, and they can only be relieved from them by going into the open country. Com. v. Miller, 139 Pa. 77, 83, 84.

If the owner of real estate suffers a nuisance to be created or continued by another on or adjacent to his premises in the prosecution of a business for his benefit, when he has the power to prevent or abate the nuisance, he is liable for an injury resulting therefrom to third persons; and therefore such a party would be liable to reimburse the municipal-

Messrs. D. P. Hatch and R. B. Treat for petitioner.

Mr. C. McFarland for respondent.

Garoutte, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The petitioner has been convicted and imprisoned for violating a city ordinance of the city of Los Angeles which provides: "No person or persons shall establish or conduct any steam shoddy machine or steam carpet-beating machine within 100 feet of any church, schoolhouse, residence, or dwelling house." He now alleges the judgment void, upon the ity the damages and expenses they have occasioned through the wrongful act of the defendant in so permitting the nuisance to exist. Chicago v. Robbins, 87 U. S. 2 Black, 418, 424, 17 L. ed. 298, 302.

There are many noxious useful things which a municipality cannot, lawfully, under a general grant of power, declare nuisances, such as the exercise of certain trades and callings, as that of a physician, druggist, and the like; and in all such cases the courts, acting upon their own experience and knowledge of human affairs, would say, as a matter of law, that the exercise of such trades or callings or things of like character is not a nuisance, and that any attempt to so declare it by the municipal authorities is an unwarranted abuse of their power. North Chicago City R. Co. v. Lake View, 105 Ill. 207, 213, 44 Am. Rep. 788.

The public health, welfare, and safety of the community are matters of paramount importance to which all the pursuits, occupations, and employments of individuals inconsistent with their preservation must yield, and it is immaterial, so far as the government is concerned in the administration of the law for the general welfare, how long a noxious practice may have prevailed or illegal acts been persisted in. Com. v. Upton, 6 Gray, 473, 476.

Any occupation comes within the range of the police power which is such as to be naturally liable to create a nuisance unless subjected to special regulations, whether it be so conducted as in fact to create a nuisance or not. State v. Orr, 68 Conn. 101, 34 L. R. A. 279.

A nuisance may consist in the carrying out of any trade or business in such a manner as to emit offensive odors and stenches either injurious to the health of the public or making the occupation of neighboring houses uncomfortable and disagreeable. Com. v. Kidder, 107 Mass. 188, 192.

So, a nuisance may be produced by offensive sounds in the prosecution of a business lawful per se. Whitney v. Bartholomew, 21 Conn. 213; Brown v. Illius, 27 Conn. 84, 71 Am. Dec. 49; Bishop v. Banks, 83 Conn. 118, 121, 87 Am. Dec. 197.

And a nuisance at common law may consist in the keeping of or manufacturing of gunpowder, naphtha, or other explosives or inflammable substances in such quantities and places, or in such a manner, as to be dangerous to the persons or property of the inhabitants of the neighborhood. Com. v. Kidder, 107 Mass. 188, 192.

As to negligence in respect to explosives, see note to Judson v. Giant Powder Co. (Cal.) 29 L. R. A. 718.

Where a trade or business is a nuisance in itself it cannot be carried on in a thickly populated district. Com. v. Rush, 11 Lanc. L. Rev. 97.

In Prescott's Case, 2 N. Y. City Hall Rec. 161, it is said that a lawful business carried on in a populous city ought to be so conducted that the least possible annoyance or inconvenience will arise therefrom to the injury of the citizens.

So, where a business is carried on which may or may not create a nuisance, the persons so conducting such business are bound to use the most improved methods in order to prevent such nuisance. Com. v. Rush, 11 Lanc. L. Rev. 97.

And if, from the manner in which the business of a stock-yard company is operated, such as the boiling and manufacturing the viscera and intestines and the extracting of the fat and the disposal of the products, and the condition in which the buildings and cattle pens are kept, the same is unquestionably a nuisance, it will be abated. Babcock v. New Jersey Stock Yard Co. 20 N. J. Eq. 296.

A city has the right by reasonable and general provisions, by ordinance, to regulate and restrain all noxious and injurious callings within its limits. Chicago v. Rumpf, 45 Ill. 90, 93, 32 Am. Dec. 196.

It is a well-established rule that municipal ordinances placing restrictions upon lawful conduct or the lawful use of property must, in order to be valid, specify the rules and conditions to be observed in such conduct or business, and must admit of the exercise of the privilege by all citizens alike who will comply with such rules and conditions, and must not admit of the exercise, or of an opportunity for the exercise, of any arbitrary discrimination by the municipal authorities between citizens who will so comply. Richmond v. Dudley, 129 Ind. 112, 114-116, 13 L. R. A. 587.

A business not unlawful in itself may be brought under control by safe and proper regulations touching the modes of conducting such business in order to avoid annoyance to the public. Garrett v. State, 49 N. J. L. 94, 103, 60 Am. Rep. 562.

And it makes no difference that such business may have been carried on under the authority of the city. Davenport v. Richmond City, 81 Va. 636, 59 Am. Rep. 694.

A trade or occupation of carriage making, or of a blacksmith, is a lawful and useful one, and a shop or building erected for its exercise is not a nuisance per se, yet, if erected in an improper place so as to result in public injury to others, it is a wrongful act which may be abated. Whitney v. Bartholomew, 21 Conn. 213, 217, 218.

Where businesses and callings are in their nature nuisances, and the law recognizes them as such, they may be interdicted by a city council, and as to them the declaration of such council is to be deemed conclusive. Harrison v. Lewiston, 46 Ill. App. 164, 165.

If the charter confers the power on the municipal authorities of a city to pass ordinances on the subject of nuisances, the city may make such ordinances as its charter authorizes, and a structure erected or a business conducted in violation of such ordinance may be dealt with in accordance with the ordinance. Lake v. Aberdeen, 57 Miss. 260, 263.

Although there can be no general restraint of trade, yet to a certain extent it may be regulated, and, by consequence, to some extent restrained in a particular place, if such restraint be for the good of the inhabitants, as when, for the prevention of nuisances, certain trades are confined to the suburbs of a city, or where it is for the advantage of the trade and improvement of the community. Mobile v. Yuille, 3 Ala. 137, 141, 36 Am. Dec. 441.

By-laws made to restrain trade in order to the better government of it are good when they are for the benefit of the place, and to avoid public inconvenience, nuisances, etc., or for the advantage of the trade and improvement of the community. Mobile v. Yuille, 3 Ala. 137, 36 Am. Dec. 441. To the same effect, Mitchell v. Reynolds, 1 P. Wms. 181; Fazakerley v. Wiltshire, 1 Strange, 463; Rex v. Harrison, 3 Burr. 1822; Wannell v. London, 1 Strange, 675; Pierce v. Bartrum, 1 Cowp. 269; Gunmakers' Soc. v. Fell, Willes, Rep. 384; Dunham v. Rochester, 5 Cow. 462; Shelton v. Mobile, 30 Ala. 540, 68 Am. Dec. 143; Huntsville v. Phelps, 27 Ala. 65.

It has been further stated that a city has the right, by reasonable and general provisions by or-ground that the ordinance is void, and seeks his release by writ of habeas corpus. He claims the ordinance void upon the ground that it interferes with certain of his inalienable rights vouchsafed to him by the Constitution. Upon the part of the city, it is claimed that the passage and enforcement of the ordinance are but the exercise of a police power granted to it in terms, by the Constitution of the state. The Constitution of the state of California (art. 11, § 11) provides: "Any county, city, town, or township may make and enforce, within its limits, all such local, police, sanitary, and other regulations as are not in conflict with dinance, to regulate and restrain all noxious and injurious callings within its limits, and may prevent slaughterhouses from being maintained or animals from being slaughtered in designated localities within the city, and, possibly, it may prohibit and wholly restrain such things within the city limits; and further, there is no doubt that a city has the power to designate the particular locality of a city within which the business may be conducted, and to prohibit it in others; and regulate and restrain it so as to prevent its becoming offensive or injurious. Chicago v. Rumpff, 45 Ill. 90, 92 Am. Dec. 190, 208.

And this is so for the reason that it is the right of the legislative body of the city government, as the tribunal established by law, to determine the question of nuisance or no nuisance, to restrain any occupation which proves detrimental to public health. State, Marshall, v. Cadwalader, 26 N. J. L. 283, 284.

So, in Ex parte Andrews, 18 Cal. 678, it is stated that the legislature has not only the power to regulate, but also the power to suppress particular branches of business deemed by it immoral and prejudicial to the general good.

Many things, not nuisances per se, may become such when placed in locations forbidden by law, and where they essentially interfere with the enjoyment of life or property. Baumgartner v. Haaty, 100 Ind. 575, 576, 50 Am. Dec. 830.

A perversion of the police power is not shown by the fact that the business restrained is a necessary and lawful business which has not yet become a public nuisance in fact, or been declared to be such by statute; the law interfering for the protection of the public by preventing in advance a threatened probable injury, exposure to danger being itself an injury. Watertown v. Mayo, 109 Mass. 315, 12 Am. Rep. 694.

The power conferred by a city charter to declare, prevent, and abate nuisances on public or private property, and the causes thereof, although it may not extend so far as to authorize the municipal authorities to make, by an ordinance, that a nuisance which was not so before, as a matter of law, yet enables them to take precautions against eventual and contingent nuisances by confining, within certain limits, certain establishments, trades, or occupations which from their known character are likely to become such. State, Russell, v. Beattie, 16 Mo. App. 131.

So, with respect to the carrying on of a lawful trade which may become a nuisance, it has been stated that, as a police regulation, it is not essential that the provisions of the enactment should be applicable to all parts of the commonwealth, density of population itself being an element which may increase the danger to be provided against, and which in any locality may justify the interference of the legislature and relieve it from the objection that it is partial and unequal. Watertown v. Mayo, 109 Mass. 315, 12 Am. Rep. 694. To the same effect, Com. v. Alger, 7 Cush. 68; Baker v. Boston, 12 Pick. 184, 22 Am. Dec. 421; Austin v. Murray, 16 Pick. 121; Coates v. New York, 7 Cow. 565, 604.

In cases involving the question of preventing, abating, or regulating certain businesses, much must depend upon the site where the erections are, or where the factories or trades are carried on, or where the cattle or pigs are kept or allowed to be kept, whether they will prove to be a nuisance or not. McKnight v. Toronto, 3 Ont. Rep. 284.

The establishment of a rural cemetery and the interment of the dead therein would not necessarily nor probably be a business which was nauseous, offensive, or unwholesome, under a clause in the state statute giving the trustees power to regulate and restrain places where a nauseous, offensive, or unwholesome business may be carried on. Lake View v. Letz, 44 Ill. 81, 83.

Whether a particular business is a nuisance or not is a mixed question of law and of fact, and an indictment for maintaining such a nuisance must charge the facts necessary to bring it within the definition of a nuisance, or, at least, within the power conferred in the statute to suppress it, and the power given to municipal authorities to regulate does not embrace a power to prohibit or destroy a trade or occupation. State v. Mott, 61 Md. 294, 48 Am. Rep. 105, 107.

In Reg. v. Lister, 3 Jur. N. S. 570, 26 L. J. M. C. N. S. 106, Dears. & B. C. C. 300, it was held that it was a question of fact for the jury whether the keeping and depositing or the manufacturing of inflammable substances and dangerous, ignitable, and explosive fluids, such as wood naphtha, in a warehouse or building, was dangerous to life and property, and that the liability to ignition ab extra was properly taken into consideration by the jury.

Any trade or business carried on in a town or populous neighborhood, or near a public road or highway, which produces noxious or offensive smells to the annoyance of the neighborhood, or persons traveling along the public road, is a common nuisance and indictable, and it is not necessary that they are offensive to health, it is sufficient if they are offensive to the senses. State v. Luce, 9 Houst. (Del.) 396; State v. Wetherall, 5 Harr. (Del.) 487.

If the smells or odors produced by such trade are detrimental to the comfort of those dwelling near them and to passers-by, they will be declared a nuisance and abated as such. Ashbrook v. Com., 1 Bush, 139, 89 Am. Dec. 616, 619.

Under the Massachusetts statute (Gen. Stat. chap. 26), which gives the board of health power to forbid the exercise within the city limits, or any particular locality thereof, of any trade or employment which is a nuisance, or hurtful to the inhabitants, or dangerous to the public health, or the exercise of which is attended by noisome and injurious odors, or is otherwise injurious to their estates, the city authorities have power to proceed in a summary way in order to accomplish the abatement of such nuisance; as to allow such trade to be carried on until it can be decided by a jury to be a nuisance will defeat the purposes of the statute, and private rights in such cases would be considered subordinate to the public welfare. In such a case the defendant's allegation that the trade he carries on is not a nuisance is no defense in proceedings taken against him under such statutes. Taunton v. Taylor, 116 Mass. 254, 261.

And under § 52 of such statute the order of a board of health prohibiting the trade or employment of the business of preparing tripe, manufacturing neat's-foot oil, tallow and glue stock, and the boiling and drying of bones, hoofs, heads, refuse, and partially decayed animal matter, and also as a part of such trade or employment the storing general laws." It will thus be observed that Los Angeles city is vested with certain powers by direct grant from the Constitution, and that grant of power is not confined within narrow limits, but is broad and far-reaching in its scope and effect. Under this grant of power the city had the right to pass this ordinance, unless it is in conflict with general about the premises of putrid meats, bones, heads, legs, and various other materials from which offensive smells emanate, which are used in such trade or employment, is a valid exercise of the power conferred upon the board of health. Taunton v. Taylor, 116 Mass. 254, 261.

Yet a city cannot, by any ordinance regarding nuisances, whatever its provisions, recover a penalty of an individual for keeping within the city limits articles of property, which otherwise might be lawfully owned and kept, merely because they emit a disagreeable odor. Sippman v. South Bend, 84 Ind. 276, 279.

The case of an offensive trade causing effluvia is within § 114 of the English public health act of 1875, if the effluvia, though not injurious to persons in sound health, causes sick persons to become worse. Malton Local Bd. of Health v. Malton Farmers' Manure & Trading Co. L. R. 4 Exch. Div. 302, 49 L. J. M. C. N. S. 90, 44 J. P. 155.

If a board of health orders the suspension of a business which is a nuisance per se, it does not deprive a man of his property without due process of law, the legislature having power to give the board such authority. Coe v. Schultz, 47 Barb. 64, 2 Abb. Pr. N. S. 193.

Upon the question as to whether or not such ordinances are or are not an infringement of Constitutional rights, see note to Grossman v. Oakland (Or.) 36 L. R. A. 593.

Where the general statutes of a state empower the selectmen of the town, in their capacity as a board of health, to forbid the exercise of any trade or employment within the limits of the town "which is a nuisance or hurtful to the inhabitants, or dangerous to the public health, or the exercise of which is attended by noisome or injurious odors, or is otherwise injurious to their instincts," the power thus vested is in its nature quasi judicial, and necessarily involves the determination of the question whether a particular trade falls within the category contemplated by the legislature, and requires the officers charged with the duty to use their discretion and judgment in adjudicating upon the matter. Belcher v. Farrar, 8 Allen, 325, 327.

The selectmen of a town may, under Mass. Gen. Stat. chap. 26, § 52, prohibit the exercising of offensive trades within the limits of the town, without giving notice to the person carrying on such trade; yet the prohibition contained in such section operates only as a temporary suspension of the use of the property, if the owner sees fit to appeal and submit the question whether the trade or employment which he exercises is a nuisance, or hurtful or injurious to the inhabitants or their estates. Belcher v. Farrar, 8 Allen, 325, 327.

Massachusetts Gen. Stat. chap. 26, § 52, etc., in reference to the places where, and the buildings in which, offensive trades and manufactures or other employments are to be carried on, have in no way superseded the common-law remedy by indictment in the carrying on of an offensive trade or manufacture. Com. v. Rumford Chemical Works, 16 Gray, 231.

The powers given to local boards of health under the New Jersey Statutes of 1874 (Pamph. Laws, p. 569), and Laws of 1884 (Pamph. Laws, p. 282), are granted solely for the repression, and not the creation or protection, of nuisances, and the power to license a trade or business is given as a means of exercising restraint and control over doubtful pursuits, as to those noxious in their nature or becoming so from carelessness, the sole power given or 88 L. R. A.

designed to be given being to abate and suppress. Garrett v. State, 49 N. J. L. 103, 60 Am. Rep. 562.

The board of health of the city of New York have no power, under the act of 1850 (2 Rev. Stat. 5th ed. p. 12), and the Laws of 1850, p. 597, § 2, p. 606, to declare a trade or business to be a nuisance unless notice and opportunity to be heard be given to the owner of such trade or business. People, Savage, v. New York Bd. of Health, 38 Barb. 344.

For the purpose of suppressing such establishments as city authorities may consider nuisances, as being peculiarly dangerous to the public peace, and to the tranquillity of the neighborhood in which they are located, and as destroyers of good morals, a city may, by ordinance, impose a tax upon persons pursuing particular occupations, such as the keeping of a coffee house with theatrical performances. Goldsmith v. New Orleans, 31 La. Ann. 646, 648.

Where the city charter gives the authorities power to regulate and prevent the carrying on of dangerous manufactures as causing or promoting fires, and to prevent and remove all nuisances, a city ordinance which provided that all steam gristmills, sawmills, and other machinery run by steam contained and operated in buildings or structures wholly or in part of wood, which establishments, by reason of the defect or delapidation of the buildings, the defective structure of the machinery, the worn-out condition of the boiler, or any other cause, are or shall thereafter become dangerous to persons or property in the vicinity, shall be deemed public nuisances and liable to be proceeded against as such, is a valid exercise of the police power and within the terms of the charter. Green v. Lake, 60 Miss. 451.

The mere fact that a certain machine was in operation at the place mentioned in the ordinance, before the passing thereof, is no defense in proceedings by the municipal authorities under such ordinance to abate such nuisance. Kansas v. McAlleer, 31 Mo. App. 433, 438. To the same effect, Hayden v. Tucker, 37 Mo. 214; Campbell v. Seaman, 63 N. Y. 568, 20 Am. Rep. 567; Weir's Appeal, 74 Pa. 230; Coates v. New York, 7 Cow. 685.

And the erection of adjoining buildings near to a distillery which emits unwholesome smells is no defense in an action for maintaining a public nuisance by the emission of such odors from such business. Richard's Case, 6 N. Y. City Hall Rec. 61.

In Ellis v. State, 7 Blackf. 534, where the defendant was prosecuted for erecting a nuisance by means of a noxious trade in steaming the entrails and other offal of hogs, etc., which created noisome and unwholesome smells, it was held that evidence tending to prove that the defendant's business existed prior to the erection of buildings and dwelling houses in the vicinity ought to have been allowed as a defense against the charge of maintaining a nuisance, the court relying upon the case of Rex v. Cross, 2 Car. & P. 483.

Even though the tanks used by the defendant in the prosecution of his business wherein he caused and suffered the carcasses of dead animals and offal and filth and other noisome substances to be collected upon his premises were not in themselves nuisances, or the business of operating a nuisance, or liable to become so when operated with proper care, yet the fact that the defendant collected more carcasses than could be rendered before they became offensive to the neighborhood does not excuse him from liability as creating a nuisance; and the mere fact that the business was a public benefit laws; and we know of no general laws which conflict with it, unless it can be said to be violative of those general principles of constitutional liberty which form the very foundation of both the state and Federal Constitutions. We see nothing in the language of this ordinance contrary to these great principles of our government. We see nothing there de-was no justification for his action, neither was the fact that the persons injured had contributed to such business. Seacord v. People, 121 Ill. 623, 632, 638.

In Sawyer v. State Bd. of Health, 125 Mass. 182, the court passed upon the authority of the board of health and public authorities to prohibit certain trades within certain localities, which trades were adjudged to be nuisances, but that case really turned upon the question of the right of the person aggrieved by the order of the board of health abating such nuisance, to appeal to a jury from the decision of such board.

The want of power in a municipal corporation to suppress a particular occupation as a nuisance, or as a means of preventing fire, should be shown in the proof; although such authorities have power to pass all laws which are necessary or proper to carry into effect any given power, and the degree of its necessity or propriety will not be minutely or critically scrutinized, yet the court ought to see that it may be the means of accomplishing the object of the grant. Glenn v. Baltimore, 5 Gill & J. 424, 429.

Yet municipal authorities, having power to abate nuisances, cannot absolutely prohibit a lawful business not necessarily a nuisance, but may abate it when so carried on as to constitute a nuisance. They cannot, under the claim of exercising the police power, substantially prohibit a lawful trade unless it is so conducted as to be injurious or dangerous to the public health. Greensboro v. Ehrenreich, 80 Ala. 579, 583, 60 Am. Rep. 130.

A statute giving power to departments of health or the commission or commissioners thereof in any incorporated city of the state to enforce an act to prevent fat rendering, bone boiling, or the manufacturing of fertilizers within the corporate limits of any incorporated city in the state, or within a distance of 3 miles from the corporate limits thereof, ought not to be construed in a manner that would attribute to the legislature a purpose to prohibit the carrying on of a fat rendering establishment irrespective of the manner in which it is conducted, or if its effect is injurious or otherwise upon the community, and it will be assumed that the legislature intended to act within its ordinary police power to suppress nuisances and to punish persons carrying on such business in such a manner as to become such; and if the statute itself does not use language of such explicit import as to preclude any other construction an intention will not be attributed to the lawmaking power to arbitrarily interdict such business recognized as a lawful business irrespective of such facts. People v. Rosenberg, 138 N. Y. 410, 415.

So, under a delegation of powers to preserve health, and to prevent and remove nuisances, and also to regulate the places for carrying on lawful but offensive trades, the city authorities are not vested with the exercise of any unlimited control over the trade and business occupations of the people. State v. Mott, 61 Md. 297, 304, 48 Am. Rep. 105.

And a business which is not in its nature a nuisance irrespective of its local surroundings, especially where there is no authority conferred upon the city authorities to declare it a nuisance, either to health, comfort, or property, cannot be so declared by such authorities, in the absence of an express authority. State v. Mott, 61 Md. 297, 48 Am. Rep. 105, 107.

So, a city board of health has no authority to prevent any inhabitant from carrying on any lawful business, not necessarily a nuisance, in such a manner as not to be a public nuisance; and such a body, in the exercise of its police power, will be confined to such interruptions as may be reasonably necessary to enable it to abate such nuisances. Well v. Ricord, 24 N. J. Eq. 169, 173.

If the business, by reason of its location, the character of the buildings in which it is conducted, or the manner in which it is carried on, may become a nuisance, the most that can be claimed by the city is the power to regulate or to abate such business, and where the effort is not to regulate the business by prescribing the method of conducting it, or the abatement of it as a nuisance, an ordinance which calls for a confiscation of the property, not on account of the business having become a nuisance, but because the owner has failed to secure a permit to conduct such business, is void. Plymouth v. Schultheis, 135 Ind. 339.

And corporate authorities cannot, by an arbitrary ordinance, destroy private property by force, or compel the owner of it to have it removed, unless it is a nuisance and so declared in the ordinance, and shown to be such by its location or by the sanitary condition of the city or town. Pieri v. Sheldaboro, 42 Miss. 493, 495. In this case the city ordinance ordered the removal of the defendant's lumber from his lumber yard on the banks of a bay, and caused the marshal of the city to remove or destroy the same by force, and the ordinance was held invalid.

Again, an ordinance making a particular business a nuisance is too broad, and will be held invalid, where neither the business or occupation nor the subject thereof is a nuisance per se,—especially when the ordinance has no regard for the fact whether the act is or is not a nuisance, or whether the subject-matter thereof has in general become such. Arkadelphia v. Clark, 52 Ark. 23.

And a city ordinance restraining the lawful use of property and nature of a business carried on therein, which does not declare the business or its location to be a nuisance, or provide any conditions under which it may be transacted either as to the location, character of the buildings, drainage, ventilation, or processes employed, its manifest intention being not to regulate or prohibit tanneries, but to confer upon the board of health and the common council the undefined power of determining by whom and where such businesses should be conducted, is void. Plymouth v. Schultheis, 135 Ind. 339.

So, a charter giving power, by ordinance, to regulate and prevent the carrying on of manufactures dangerous, causing or promoting fires, and to prevent and remove all nuisances, does not confer upon the authorities the right to declare a particular structure or business, such as that of a flouring mill not condemned by any law or ordinance, to be a nuisance, and to have the structure removed or the business stopped or interfered with. Lake v. Aberdeen, 57 Miss. 200, 213.

And although a business which is useful and necessary may become a nuisance by reason of the growth of a village or town around it, yet there is a manifest distinction between such a case and that of a person who seeks to establish an offensive business in a thickly populated neighborhood. New Castle v. Raney, 130 Pa. 548, 561, 6 L. R. A. 737.

So, where an establishment, trade, or occupation is lawful and not in itself a nuisance, but nevertheless may become such from the place where, or manner in which, it is erected or carried on, it is not competent for the legislative power, much less for the executive power of a municipal corporation, to make it a nuisance by merely declaring it to be such. State, Russell, v. Beattie, 16 Mo. App. 131.

prising petitioner of any fundamental right. In the exercise of its police and sanitary power the city has attempted to regulate the business of beating carpets by steam power. Under its constitutional grant, it had the right to regulate this business. The use of steam power, of itself, within municipal territory, has always been recognized as a proper subject of regu-

The defendants charged with maintaining a public nuisance in a trade or business have a right to have the character of their business determined in the light of all the surrounding circumstances, including the character of the city as a manufacturing place and the manner and use of the river flowing through such city for manufacturing purposes, and if, looked at in this way, it constitutes a common nuisance, it should be removed; if not it may be conducted without subjecting the proprietors to the pecuniary loss which its removal would involve. Com. v. Miller, 139 Pa. 77, 83, 94.

And municipal authorities cannot declare in advance a certain business to be prohibited because it may become a nuisance, as in such a case there would not only be an exercise, by the legislative department of the city, of a judicial power, but it would be going further in the exercise of such power than the judicial courts have gone, the doctrine of the courts being that judicial powers will not be exerted to enjoin an eventual or contingent nuisance. State, Russell, v. Beattie, 16 Mo. App. 131.

As to judicial determination, see note to Grossman v. Oakland (Or.) 36 L. R. A. 593.

The mere fact or possibility that a business carried on within the limits of the city may in the future become a nuisance will not justify the city in prohibiting the business entirely in anticipation. State v. Mott, 61 Md. 297, 48 Am. Rep. 105, 107.

In an English case it is said that where a man sets up a noxious business in a neighborhood where such business has long been carried on, he cannot be held for a nuisance, unless it is shown that the noxious vapor is much increased by his business. Bex v. Neville, Peake, N. P. 91.

Yet it would seem that in the United States the fact that a business, the conducting of which constitutes a nuisance, is established upon an open common, remote from habitation, will not defeat a prosecution of the proprietors for the maintenance of a nuisance, after the land in its vicinity has been built up and occupied, as such business must give way to the rights of the public, and when buildings and habitations approach the place of its location means must be devised to avoid the nuisance, or it must be removed or stopped. People v. Detroit White Lead Works, 82 Mich. 471, 9 L. R. A. 722.

So, although a municipal corporation may have power to enforce fines for the violation of its ordinances respecting nuisances by reason of offensive trades, yet it cannot designate one individual or one establishment and subject its owners to punishment, such proceeding being contrary to common right. First Municipality v. Blinneau, 3 La. Ann. 688.

Where the city ordinance only relates to the future erection and location of slaughterhouses, the authorities have no power to put an end to an existing business of that kind so long as it is not a nuisance per se. Wreford v. People, 14 Mich. 41, 46.

An asylum for the treatment of mild forms of insanity is not properly classed as a business of such a noxious or offensive character as that the health, safety, or comfort of the surrounding community requires its exclusion from the particular locality, an asylum not being a nuisance per se. Ex parte Whitwell, 98 Cal. 73, 83, 19 L. R. A. 727.

So, theatrical performances, legalized by the payment of a tax imposed by the city corporation, are not within the provisions of an act giving the city authorities power to make, limit, and impose reasonable fines for all misdemeanors, disorders, 38 L. R. A.

neglects, and nuisances committed within the limits of the city for which the laws of the state have not provided an ample remedy. Waters v. Leach, 8 Ark. 110, 155.

A complaint charging the defendant with keeping a large quantity of hides, tallow, and other substances which emit a disagreeable odor, but not appraising him of the fact whether he is to answer a public or a private nuisance, the facts themselves not constituting a nuisance either public or private, will be held erroneous upon a motion in arrest of judgment, and the judgment will therefore be reversed and the case remanded. Lippman v. South Bend, 84 Ind. 276, 279.

An ordinance prohibiting a business entirely within the limits of a city, even though carried on in the remotest outskirts thereof, is invalid—especially where the evidence does not show that it is now, or ever may become, a nuisance, the public health not being affected thereby. State v. Mott, 61 Md. 297, 48 Am. Rep. 105.

So, under the power to abate nuisances as contained in a charter, a city council cannot prohibit every specified trade or business until such trade or business is shown to be so employed as to be inimical to the public health or safety, or until the provisions of the ordinance relating to the mode of carrying on the same are contravened so as to render them nuisances. State, Marshall, v. Cadwalader, 36 N. J. L. 233, 234.

And a board of health cannot, by resolution, after declaring the business of skin dressing a nuisance and notifying the proprietors to remove, correct, and abate the same within a given time, empower the street commissioners to proceed to abate the same, when such business has not been declared a public nuisance by the common council. They cannot delegate the right to pass upon such question to the street commissioners, and the board of health, in the absence of an ordinance defining what circumstances of abuse render such occupation obnoxious, has itself no power in that matter where the clause in the charter, giving the city power to establish a board of health, contains no warrant to the common council to delegate to, or confer upon, such board the powers and duties which such common council are directed to exercise. State, Marshall, v. Cadwalader, 36 N. J. L. 234, 236.

So, although a city has a right by reasonable and general provisions, by its ordinance to restrain all noxious and injurious trades within the city limits, and to designate the particular locality within which such trade may be conducted, yet it must so act that all persons must be free to act and engage in it within such localities by conforming to the municipal regulations. Chicago v. Rumpff, 45 Ill. 90, 92 Am. Dec. 196, 208.

Upon the question whether or not an established trade or business lawful in itself can be declared a nuisance without judicial investigation, see head IV. of note to Grossman v. Oakland (Or.) 36 L. R. A. 593.

As to the extent of municipal power over nuisances in the use of buildings in general, see note to Evansville v. Miller (Ind.) ante, 161.

II. Slaughterhouses.

While it may be said that the question whether a slaughterhouse is or is not a public or common nuisance depends upon the circumstances of each lation; and in addition, here it may well be assumed that the dust and other disagreeable and unhealthy matters arising in such quantities from the beating of carpets, as would naturally be indicated by the use of steam power, are a constant source of danger and menace to the good health and general welfare of the neighborhood where located.

particular case, yet, the power of municipal corporations to limit the existence of such houses to particular localities, and to regulate such business or trade, is a valid exercise of the police power, and in general exists as a means of preventing nuisances and of preserving the health and comfort of the public, so long as the ordinances passed for such purpose contravene no constitutional rights, and follow the general rules of law with respect to city ordinances in general.

In this connection it has been said that the regulation of the place and manner of conducting the slaughtering of animals, and the business of butchering within a city, and the inspection of the animals to be killed for meat, and of the meat afterwards, is among the most necessary and frequent exercises of the police power. Slaughter-House Cases, 83 U. S. 16 Wall. 36, 61, 21 L. ed. 394, 404.

A city under the power conferred by charter may prevent slaughterhouses from being maintained, or animals from being slaughtered, in designated localities within the city, and it may be that they can prohibit and wholly restrain it within the city limits. Such bodies have the power to designate the particular quarter of the city within which the business may be conducted, and prohibit it in others, and regulate and restrain them so as to prevent their becoming offensive or injurious, but in doing so all persons should be free to engage in the business within those localities by conforming to the municipal regulations. Chicago v. Rumpff, 45 Ill. 90, 92 Am. Dec. 196.

And in Slaughter-House Cases, 83 U. S. 16 Wall. 36, 61, 21 L. ed. 394, 404, it is said that a statute defining the localities within which slaughterhouses may be established, and forbidding slaughtering in any others, does not deprive butchers of the right to labor in their occupation, or the people of their daily service in preparing food, and cannot be said to destroy the business of a butcher or seriously interfere with its pursuit, the power to define such limits and to regulate such business being for the security of social order, the life and health of the citizen, the comfort of an existence in a thickly populated community, the enjoyment of private and social life, and the beneficial use of property.

In Slaughter-House Cases, 83 U. S. 16 Wall. 36, 21 L. ed. 394, the charter of the Slaughterhouse Company, a corporation created by the statute of Louisiana, contained, among other exclusive privileges, the right to establish and maintain stockyards and landing places and slaughterhouses for the city of New Orleans, at which all stock must be landed, and all animals intended for food must be slaughtered. It was held that this grant of privilege, guarded by proper limitation of the prices to be charged, and imposing the duty of providing ample convenience, with permission to all owners of stock to land, and to all butchers to slaughter at those places, was a police regulation for the health and comfort of the people, the statute locating them where health and comfort required, within the power of the state legislature, unaffected by the Constitution of the United States previous to the adoption of the 13th and 14th articles of the Amendment.

So, in Butchers' Union S. H. & L. S. L. Co. v. Crescent City L. S. L. & S. H. Co. 111 U. S. 746, 28 L. ed. 556, where it was sought to abate the appellant's business of butchering and receiving and landing of live stock intended for butchering within certain limits and certain parishes, it is stated that, although the legislature of the state may give an exclusive right for the time being to particular persons or to a corporation to provide a stock landing and to establish a slaughterhouse in a city, yet it has no right to continue such right so that no future legislation, nor even the same body, can repeal or modify it; and further, that the state legislature cannot by any contract limit the exercise of the police power of the state to the prejudice of the general welfare in regard to public health and public morals.

In Liverpool New Cattle Market Co. v. Hodson, L. R. 2 Q. B. 131, 36 L. J. M. C. N. S. 30, 15 L. T. N. S. 534, 15 Week. Rep. 568, the company was held liable to the penalty imposed by § 64 of the English public health act of 1848, which prohibits the new establishment of the business of slaughtering cattle, etc., or other noxious or offensive business in any building or place in any district, after the act has been applied to it, without the consent of the local board of health. A cattle market-company, cattle having never been slaughtered in the market before, after the act had been applied to the district erected a building in which it allowed persons to slaughter cattle for a certain payment a head; it was held the penalty was rightly imposed.

But where the charter authorizes the city authorities to license or regulate slaughterhouses, and the corporate body have made the necessary regulations required for the health or comfort of the inhabitants, all persons inclined to pursue such an occupation should have the opportunity of conforming to such regulations, otherwise the ordinance will be unreasonable and tend to oppression; and if such authorities regard it for the interest of the city that such establishment shall be licensed the ordinance should be so framed that all persons desiring it may obtain licenses by conforming to the prescribed terms and regulations for the government of such business, and it is neither a regulation nor a license of such business to confine it to one building or to give it to one individual, such action being oppressive, creating a monopoly never contemplated by the general assembly, and opposed to the rules governing the adoption of municipal by-laws. Chicago v. Rumpff, 45 Ill. 90, 97, 92 Am. Dec. 196.

So, an ordinance confining the business of a slaughterhouse to a small lot, or even to a particular block or ground, is unreasonable and tends to create a monopoly. Chicago v. Rumpff, 45 Ill. 90, 96, 92 Am. Dec. 196.

With reference to the question as to whether or not such business is a nuisance, it has been stated that a slaughterhouse is not of itself a nuisance although it may become so by the manner in which it is conducted. Cooper v. Schultz, 32 How. Pr. 107, 121.

The business of butchering cattle is a legitimate one, and must necessarily be carried on in the vicinity of each town or city the inhabitants of which need to be supplied with meat, and therefore a pen in which live cattle are kept and a house in which they are slaughtered is not per se a public or private nuisance, unless established so near the center of population or to a private dwelling place as to necessarily and unavoidably hurt and annoy the public, or invade and do damage to the private vested rights of an individual, and that such an establishment, if located a reasonable distance from the center of population and from dwelling places of individuals, can only be regarded and treated as a nuisance public or private when the business is conducted in such a negligent or reckless manner as to become offensive and hurtful to the public and

Conceding the business covered by the provisions of this ordinance not to constitute a nuisance per se, and to stand upon different grounds from powder factories, street obstructions, and the like, still the case is made no better for petitioner. This is not a question of nuisance per se, and the power to regulate is in no way dependent upon such individuals. Beckham v. Brown, 19 Ky. L. Rep. 519, 520.

In Atty. Gen. v. Steward, 20 N. J. Eq. 415, 420, it is said, there are certain things and certain trades which are considered as nuisances of themselves, as a slaughterhouse in a thickly populated town, yet these are not nuisances simply because erected within the limits of an incorporated city, the question whether they are nuisances depending upon the extent to which the business is carried on and the manner in which it is conducted.

Again, in Moses v. State, 58 Ind. 185, 187, it is said that even the best conducted slaughterhouse if in the wrong place might become a public nuisance. In this case the appellant was prosecuted for maintaining a slaughterhouse in violation of 2 Ind. Rev. Stat. 1876, § 8, p. 460, which provides that every person who shall erect or continue and maintain any public nuisance to the injury of any part of the citizens of this city shall be fined. The court stated that the fact that such business was carried on in an orderly manner, and that the house was kept as clean as can reasonably be expected, does not excuse the defendant.

Such a business, although not of itself a nuisance, may become such by mismanagement or by neglect, and even under the most careful management it may at times become offensive to those who reside upon, or who have occasion to be in, the street where it is situated. State v. Wilson, 43 N. H. 415, 420, 82 Am. Dec. 163.

A slaughterhouse may be a nuisance if ill-managed or neglected, though it may not be in any sense in a compact part of the town. State v. Wilson, 43 N. H. 415, 420, 82 Am. Dec. 163.

This same principle is also held in private actions for the abatement or restriction of such business as a nuisance, but as such cases do not fall within the scope of this note they are not here noticed.

Where the only provision of the city charter authorizes the common council to compel the owners and occupants of slaughterhouses and other designated establishments to cleanse or abate them whenever necessary for the health, comfort, or convenience of the inhabitants of the city, such power can only be exercised to do away with what are legal nuisances, and does not authorize the common council to interfere with what is not a nuisance in fact. Wreford v. People, 14 Mich. 41, 46.

Yet, in opposition to some of the above cases, it has been stated that slaughterhouses are prima facie nuisances. Selfried v. Hays, 81 Ky. 377, 381, 50 Am. Rep. 167; Catlin v. Valentine, 9 Paige, 575, 38 Am. Dec. 567; Swinton v. Pedie, 1 Macq. H. L. Cas. 74; Woodyear v. Schaefer, 57 Md. 1, 10, 40 Am. Rep. 419.

So, slaughterhouses, which to some extent occasion the atmosphere in that vicinity to become impure, noxious, poisonous, and unhealthy, are, when located in a populous part of a city, prima facie nuisances. Reichert v. Geers, 98 Ind. 73, 76, 49 Am. Rep. 736; Pruner v. Pendleton, 75 Va. 516, 40 Am. Rep. 738; Brady v. Weeks, 3 Barb. 157, 159.

The occupation of buildings for the business and purpose of a hog yard, slaughterhouse, fat and offal boiling house, in a populous city, is prima facie a common nuisance, but it may be shown that such a business can be so conducted and carried on, even in a densely populated part of the city, as not to endanger the health or interfere with the comfort of the neighboring inhabitants; and when such facts are shown the presumption is removed, and the business is not a nuisance. Dubois v. Budlong, 15 Abb. Pr. 445, 446.

Thus, the proceedings of a board of health restraining plaintiff from carrying on his slaughterhouse, upon the ground that the same, and the premises upon which it is conducted, are dangerous to life and health, and a public nuisance, and ordering the business to be abated and discontinued, and directing an order to that effect to be served, without notice or hearing, a subsequent ordinance also prohibiting the slaughtering of animals within certain districts without a special permit will be restrained,—especially where the evidence shows that such business is carried on with great care and cleanliness, and no fault is found by the neighbors, and it is abundantly proved that such a business can be carried on and regulated so as not in any case to become a nuisance or prejudicial to the public health, such a business not being a nuisance at common law. Schuster v. Metropolitan Bd. of Health, 49 Barb. 450, 452.

Yet that which would be a manifest nuisance in a crowded thoroughfare, as a slaughterhouse or tannery, on account of the offensive smell, etc., proceeding from it, or a large factory carried on with much noise, or requiring vans and other conveyances constantly to stand at its doors on the street or constantly crossing the crowded sidewalks, or where there is a very frequent deposit of goods on the sidewalks which seriously impedes their usefulness or safety for foot passengers, might not be a nuisance if carried on in an isolated situation, or in a sparsely peopled or little frequented part of a city or town, it would nevertheless be an intolerable nuisance if carried on in a densely peopled or crowded thoroughfare. McKnight v. Toronto, 3 Ont. Rep. 284.

A slaughterhouse is a calling in the nature of a nuisance and recognized by the law as such, and therefore may be interdicted by a city council,—especially where the state statute gives the city council power to declare what shall be a nuisance and to abate the same, and to impose fines for the maintenance thereof. Harrison v. Lewiston, 46 Ill. App. 164, 165.

An order of the board of supervisors prohibiting the establishment or maintenance of a slaughterhouse, or the keeping of herds of more than five swine, or the curing or keeping of hides, skins, or peltry, slaughtering cattle, swine, sheep, or any other kind of animal, or the pursuing or maintaining, or carrying on, any other business or occupation offensive to the senses, or prejudicial to the public health or comfort, in any part of a city and county after a certain date, except as otherwise provided by law, which order was passed pursuant to an act of the legislature of April 25, 1863, was held valid, the power to regulate or prohibit conferred upon the board of supervisors not only including nuisances, but extending to everything expedient for the preservation of the public health and the prevention of contagious diseases. Ex parte Shrader, 83 Cal. 279, 284.

The power to regulate such businesses by limiting their prosecution to particular localities or quarters being within the power conferred by the legislature and not contravening any constitutional provisions. Ex parte Shrader, 83 Cal. 279. To the same effect, Bourland v. Hildreth, 26 Cal. 162.

The New Hampshire statute (Rev. Stat. chap. 119), giving the health officers power to determine what are nuisances, with full power for their prevention and removal, enforcing the same by specific penalties, is a police regulation in force, and applicable to the compact parts of towns, but it does not cover the whole subject of slaughterhouse conditions. Indeed, as to nuisances per se, the general laws of the state are ample to deal with them. But the business here involved may properly be classed with livery stables, laundries, soap and glue factories, etc.—a class of business undertakings, in the conduct of which police and sanitary regulations are made to a greater or less denuisances, if, indeed, it covers any part of either, and the purview and purpose of the common law and of such statutes are entirely distinct, the statute not necessarily or naturally preventing or interfering with the application of the common law, it not being inconsistent with, and not superseding it. State v. Wilson, 43 N. H. 415, 421, 82 Am. Dec. 163.

Under the New Hampshire statutes (Rev. Stat. chap. 119), persons keeping slaughterhouses in the compact parts of towns without licenses are made liable to the penalty imposed thereby, equally, whether the buildings are or are not nuisances; and it is no defense that the most complete proof can be produced that they are not nuisances. State v. Wilson, 43 N. H. 415, 420, 82 Am. Dec. 163.

In Ex parte Heilbron, 65 Cal. 609, the court upheld an ordinance of the city prohibiting the slaughtering of animals or the erection and maintaining for use of any building as a slaughterhouse, or for the dressing or cleaning of any slaughtered animals within the city limits, the same being passed in the interest of public health and comfort and in the exercise of the city's police power, although in that case the court did not actually declare the same to be a nuisance.

So, an ordinance prohibiting the slaughtering of cattle within certain prescribed limits specifically named and described, and directing the conduct of such business in the localities from which it is not excluded, being in the interest of health and cleanliness, was upheld in Cronin v. People, 82 N. Y. 818, 37 Am. Rep. 564, as within the provisions of the charter of the city.

And in Pierce v. Bartrum, 1 Cowp. 290, the proceedings of the chamberlain of the city, under a city by-law made pursuant to a charter prohibiting the slaughtering of cattle within the city and also the keeping of swine or any filth, garbage, or annoyance, were upheld, even as against the defendant who claimed to be a stranger, he being an inhabitant pro hac vice.

The power conferred upon a common council to compel the owners and occupants of slaughterhouses and other designated establishments to cleanse or abate them whenever necessary for the health, comfort, or convenience of the inhabitants of the city, can only be exercised to do away with what are legally nuisances, and does not authorize the council to interfere with what is not a nuisance in fact. Wreford v. People, 14 Mich. 41.

The mere fact of the prosecution and continuance of a business for more than twenty years in a certain locality, before any buildings were erected or highways located in the neighborhood, will not justify the carrying on of such business as that of a slaughterhouse in the locality after houses have been built and streets laid out therein. Com. v. Upton, 6 Gray, 473, 476.

In Rex v. Watts, 2 Car. & P. 486, Moody & M. 261, a private act of Parliament declared the houses for the slaughtering of horses within 1,000 yards of a certain workhouse to be public nuisances and removable as such; but if they existed before the act the owners were to receive compensation. The court held that if an indictment was framed at common law with counts on that act the defendant might be convicted if he so carried on the trade as to make it a public nuisance, and he was not then entitled to compensation.

But where the defendant, before the passage of Mass. Stat. 1871, chap. 167, prohibiting the carrying on of the business of slaughtering cattle without the written consent of the selectmen of the town but declaring that it should not apply to any building or premises occupied for such purposes at the time of the passage of the act, and also prohibiting any enlargement or extension of the same without the written consent of the city or town authorities, used and occupied a building for such purposes and continued the same thereafter until it was destroyed by fire, after which he rebuilt the premises and continued the business, the court held that the case came within the exceptions stated in the statutes, and therefore the defendant had not forfeited his right to continue the business in the new building which was of no greater size or capacity. Watertown v. Sawyer, 100 Mass. 320.

So, in Somerville v. O'Neil, 114 Mass. 353, the same construction was placed upon the above statute with regard to slaughterhouses existing at the time of its passage.

The carrying on of a butchershop for the vending of fresh and butchered meat is a business which is liable in and of itself to become a nuisance, or become injurious to the public, if not properly supervised or carried on, and may become offensive, and is a legitimate subject of sanitary regulation, and therefore a city ordinance which provides for a license for the carrying on of such business is a valid exercise of the police power and is authorized by the legislature. St. Paul v. Colter, 12 Minn. 41, 48, 49, 90 Am. Dec. 278.

In Huesing v. Rock Island, 128 Ill. 475, it is stated that no argument is necessary to establish the fact that a slaughterhouse in a city is an unwholesome business or establishment.

And where a slaughterhouse exists so near dwelling houses as to impair the comfortable enjoyment of the dwellers therein, an actionable nuisance is created. Beiling v. Evansville, 144 Ind. 644, 35 L. R. A. 272; Beckham v. Brown, 19 Ky. L. Rep. 519, 520.

Where the defendant was charged with carrying on the business of a slaughterhouse within the bounds of the village near to the highway and to adjoining premises, and it was proved that the stench extended to the neighboring dwellings and was encountered by persons passing on the highway, and was at times so offensive as to require the doors and windows of the dwellings to be closed, and offal, manure, and putrid meat accumulated to such an extent during the winter that when it was removed in the spring the stench was much greater, and rendered persons sick who were at work at a distance of 100 rods from the slaughterhouse, such business was declared a nuisance rendering the enjoyment of life and property uncomfortable and unwholesome. Taylor v. People, 6 Park. Crim. Rep. 347, 352.

And in an action against a defendant for maintaining and causing to be maintained a public nuisance by reason of the offal of slaughtered cattle and other animals being accumulated, and producing noisome and offensive smells, an instruction to the jury, in effect, that, if the defendants allowed such offal to accumulate at their slaughterhouses from which such noisome and offensive smells were emitted, thus rendering the air impure and unhealthy, the defendants would be liable, even if the fact were that such noisome and offensive smells were blended with like smells emanating from another slaughterhouse and a deposit of filth in its vicinity, and that such would not justify or excuse a wrongful act of another defendant, constituted no defense in a prosecution against the defendant,—was upheld: nor was it misleading to the jury, such instruction containing a correct statement of the law. Dennis v. State, 91 Ind. 291, 292. To the same effect, Atty. Gen. v. Steward, 20 N. J. Eq. 415.

gree by every city in the country. And, in this class of cases is no defense to the validity of regulation ordinances to say, "I am committing no nuisance, and I insist upon being heard before a court or jury upon that question of fact." In this class of cases a defendant has no such right." To the extent that it was material in creating a valid ordi-

So, in Rex v. Cross, 2 Car. & P. 463, a certificate and license under the English statute, 28 Geo. III. chap. 17, § 1, authorizing the defendant to keep a house for the slaughtering of horses, was held to be no defense in an action for maintaining a nuisance in the keeping of such house.

Upon the question of the effect of an authority or a license in general, see notes to Grossman v. Oakland (Or.) 36 L. R. A. 593.

Again, a slaughterhouse erected or conducted in violation of the provisions of a city ordinance becomes a nuisance, especially where power is given to such corporation by the provisions of the state statute, and even though such slaughterhouse might not be a nuisance in the absence of such ordinance. Rund v. Fowler, 142 Ind. 214, 217.

Upon general principles, and considering them as nuisances, the right of removing houses for the slaughter of cattle from particular locations, as the public health requires, is within the power of the common council or other local authorities independent of a statute by which such right is given. Metropolitan Bd. of Health v. Heister, 37 N. Y. 661.

Yet where the city charter only allows the council to prevent the future erection and location of such establishments, it has no right to put an end to an existing slaughterhouse business so long as it is not a nuisance per se, inasmuch as it cannot declare that to be a nuisance which is not one in fact. Wreford v. People, 14 Mich. 41, 46.

In Tugman v. Chicago, 78 Ill. 405, 408, it is said that if the health or comfort of a city requires the prohibition of new slaughterhouses within a designated part of the city, the same reason would demand that old ones should be discontinued, and that the fact that certain persons were engaged in the business, within the district designated in the ordinance, at the time of its adoption, gives them no right to monopolize the business, nor would such fact authorize the board of health to provide that such persons may continue such business while others are deprived of a like privilege who engage in the business at a later period.

The course of legislation in the state of New York has been to confer upon the local authorities large discretionary powers, to be exercised upon emergencies for the public welfare, and they have been authorized to do, or cause to be done, whatever may be necessary for the preservation of the public health, and therefore, if the board of health come to the conclusion that the removal of a slaughterhouse is necessary for such purposes, it is a matter upon which they may clearly exercise their judgment, and with the fair exercise of it no judicial tribunal should interfere. Cooper v. Schultz, 32 How. Pr. 107, 121, 135.

In Cooper v. Schultz, 32 How. Pr. 107, an ordinance of the board prohibiting the engaging or continuing in the business of a butcher or cattle dealer at or in any public or private market in the cities of New York or Brooklyn without a permit, and further prohibiting the driving of cattle in the built-up portions of the cities between certain hours of the day, and also the yarding in, in built-up portions, of cattle without a permit, was held constitutional. In that case, however, it was not shown that such trade or business constituted a nuisance.

The proceedings and regulations of a board of health in abating the defendant's slaughterhouse business as dangerous to the public health and a nuisance do not deprive a man of his property or liberty, and are therefore not contrary to the Constitution, the same being merely health regulations 38 L. R. A.

by the district. Metropolitan Bd. of Health v. Heister, 37 N. Y. 661, 668.

See in general, as to such proceedings being an infringement of constitutional rights, notes to Grossman v. Oakland (Or.) 36 L. R. A. 593.

And the proceedings of a board of health under the New York act of 1866, creating a metropolitan sanitary district in cases relating to slaughterhouses and the driving cattle as dangerous to health and a public nuisance, will more certainly be upheld where the evidence shows that the same is offensive to the senses of the people in the vicinity, and renders their life uncomfortable,—especially when the board has given notice to the defendant to abate such nuisances, and also afforded him an opportunity to be heard, which notices he has disregarded. Metropolitan Bd. of Health v. Heister, 37 N. Y. 661.

So, an ordinance authorized by statute, prohibiting the maintenance of any slaughterhouse within the city, cannot be defeated upon the ground that it is unreasonable, it being a business subject to legislative control, as the Indiana act of 1893, § 213, giving power to the common council of cities to declare what shall constitute a nuisance, and to prevent the same and require its abatement, authorizes the removal of the same by the proper officers, and also gives power to prevent or regulate the location and to manage certain specified trades, (slaughterhouses being especially mentioned), the business of which may become noxious or injurious to public health. Beiling v. Evansville, 144 Ind. 644, 35 L. R. A. 273.

And, under a charter giving a municipal corporation power to enact ordinances necessary and proper for the preservation of the public health, and to prevent and remove nuisances, a slaughterhouse kept within the city limits upon private property, in a manner detrimental to the public health and comfort, is a nuisance. State v. Shelbyville, 4 Sneed, 176.

Again, under a city charter giving the city power, inter alia, to provide for the abatement and removal of all nuisances under its ordinances, or at common law, and also to direct the location and management of slaughterhouses and markets, an ordinance establishing a city slaughterhouse and regulating the management of slaughterhouses and packing houses in the city, and prohibiting the sale of diseased meat in the city, and directing the city controller to procure a city building and ground to be used as a city slaughterhouse by all the butchers of the city, and making it unlawful for any person to sell or dress any animal within any other limits of the city, is valid and reasonable and not in restraint of trade. Milwaukee v. Gross, 21 Wis. 241, 91 Am. Dec. 472.

But the English improvement act, providing that "no one shall slaughter cattle or dress any carcass for sale as human food in any place within the limits, other than" such slaughterhouse as therein described, applies only to the slaughtering of beasts intended by the person slaughtering for sale as human food. Elias v. Nightingale, 8 El. & Bl. 606, 27 L. J. M. C. N. S. 151, 4 Jur. N. S. 166.

So, in St. Paul v. Smith, 25 Minn. 372, it was held that a city ordinance prohibiting the carrying on of the business of slaughtering, dressing, or packing of cattle without a permit, and specifying the conditions upon which such business is to be carried on, and requiring the person so carrying on such business at all times to keep his premises in a clean, healthy, and inoffensive condition, which ordinance is known as the ordinance relating to slaughter and nance, we must assume that such question was decided by the municipal authorities, and decided against petitioner and all others similarly situated. This court said in Ex parte Shrader, 38 Cal. 284: "The legislature can add to the mala in se of the common law the mala prohibita of its own behest. . . . The power to regulate or prohibit, conferred packing houses, does not apply to the case of a person who merely kills, slaughters, and dresses one animal, the same not constituting a nuisance as understood and intended by such ordinance.

In Belling v. Evansville, 144 Ind. 644, 35 L. R. A. 272, the court did not pass upon the question whether the slaughtering of a single animal by a person within the city for meat for his own consumption would come within the inhibition of the ordinance.

And where the terms of a charter give the council power to prohibit and prevent within certain limits, to be determined by them, the location or construction of buildings for slaughterhouses and yards, butcher shops, etc., and such buildings, etc., whether within or without the city limits, are subject to such regulations as to their construction and management as such council may make with a view to the protection of property from injury by fire, or to the health and safety of the inhabitants, and to prevent them from becoming nuisances, the common council has no power to prohibit the slaughtering of animals anywhere upon a person's own premises, unless the building is devoted to such purposes. Wreford v. People, 14 Mich. 41, 46.

In the case of Villavaso v. Barthet, 30 La. Ann. 247, the court passed upon the power of a municipal corporation to regulate slaughterhouses within the municipal limits, and to declare the same nuisances, but in that case the action was not brought by the municipality to abate the nuisance, but by the plaintiff as a private citizen and in his own right.

But a city ordinance which prohibits the carrying on of certain businesses without the consent of certain persons cannot be upheld, even though the city authorities may have power to regulate businesses; and therefore an ordinance which prohibits the erection and carrying on of slaughterhouses without the consent in writing of the owner and occupant of every house within a certain distance from the proposed location of the business cannot be upheld, even though under the city charter a city has power to abate nuisances on public or private property, and the causes thereof. St. Louis v. Howard, 119 Mo. 41.

So, a by-law that no person shall keep a slaughterhouse within the city without a special resolution of the council is invalid as not within the provisions of the Canada statute of 1866, § 296, subsec. 23, which prevents or regulates the erection or continuance of slaughterhouses which may prove nuisances, as it shows there may be favoritism and restraint of trade, or it may be used to create a monopoly, and persons may not therefore all be placed upon an equal footing. Re Nash, 33 U. C. Q. B. 181.

But the Massachusetts Statutes of 1871, chap. 167, which prohibit the use of any building for slaughtering cattle, etc., or for other noxious or offensive trades, without the written consent and permission of the selectmen of any city or town containing more than 4,000 inhabitants, are constitutional and a valid exercise of the police power for the preservation of the public health, and the suppression and abatement of nuisances. Watertown v. Mayo, 109 Mass. 315, 12 Am. Rep. 694, 696.

And even though the legislature, since the enactment of the city charter, may have enacted laws relating to the incorporation of cities, ordinances previously enacted pursuant to the original charter are not inconsistent with the provisions of the state statute, and therefore such ordinances are not repealed thereby. Belling v. Evansville, 144 Ind. 644, 35 L. R. A. 272.

The city authorities have no power either legislative, judicial, or administrative, to pass an ordinance prohibiting the slaughtering or keeping or maintaining of a slaughterhouse within the limits prescribed by the city ordinance without permission of the city council, for the reason that the power delegated to a city in articles 248, 258, of the Constitution of Louisiana were exhausted when the city officials laid out the limits in which it was declared lawful to slaughter animals for food, and therefore the act of a city in so doing will be restrained by injunction pendente lite. Barthet v. New Orleans, 24 Fed. Rep. 563, 568.

In St. Paul v. Byrnes, 38 Minn. 176, 177, the defendants were charged with the violation of a city ordinance relating to slaughter and packing houses, and the question involved the construction of chapter 370 and the special laws of Minnesota of 1887, and the effect thereof as respected the operation of such ordinance. The 1st section of such ordinance declares that no person shall kill, slaughter, dress, or pack any animals, or establish a manufactory of candles or soap within the city limits without a permit, while the 2d section relates to the procedure for obtaining the permit, and the 3d and 4th included regulations for the management of the business, while the 5th provided that no slaughtering or rendering establishment shall be permitted or suffered within the seventh ward of the city of St. Paul north of a certain street, nor shall any slaughtering or rendering by butchers or others be permitted within such ward, and declares the party offending guilty of a misdemeanor. The 2d section of the act exempts existing establishments or persons then engaged in the business until the city shall have paid to the parties so carrying on such business the damages occasioned by the operation thereof. The court held that the act was specially limited to the particular district, and entirely superseded the jurisdiction of the city authorities to grant or refuse permits, or to control the locations of the business of slaughtering or butchering within the city limits, and further withdrew from the city its delegated authority and right to legislate upon that particular matter, absolutely forbidding the presence of such houses and business within the district, excepting persons who were established in the business when the act was passed, although the act had no reference to the authority of the city to enforce reasonable sanitary regulations in respect to the manner of conducting the business as to the cleanliness of premises, disposal of offal, etc.

III. Laundries.

The control and regulation of the laundry business have generally been held to be vested in municipal corporations in the exercise of their police power in order to prevent such business becoming dangerous to public health, safety, and comfort, and constituting itself a nuisance. In many cases the courts have upheld ordinances relating to such business as being strictly within the general exercise of the police power vested in such corporations, although the ordinance had not specifically called for their abatement or regulation as nuisances.

Thus, in Barbler v. Connolly, 113 U. S. 27, 28 L. ed. 823, the ordinance of the city and county of San Francisco, prohibiting the carrying on of public laundries and wash-houses within certain prescribed limits of the city and country from 10 o'clock at night until 6 o'clock in the morning, was held to be purely a police regulation upon the board of supervisors, not only includes nuisances, but extends to everything 'expedient for the preservation of the public health and the prevention of contagious diseases.' Now, there are many things not coming up to the full measure of a common-law or statute nuisance, that might, both in the light of scientific tests and of general expewithin the competency of any municipality possessed of the ordinary power to make; a Federal tribunal having no power to supervise such regulations, any correction of the action of municipal bodies in such matters coming only from the state legislation or state tribunals.

So, in Soon Hing v. Crowley, 118 U. S. 703, 28 L. ed. 1145, it was held that a similar ordinance was not void on the ground that it was not within the police power of the city and county; neither was it void on the ground that it discriminated between those engaged in the laundry business and those engaged in other classes of business, or between the different classes of persons engaged in the laundry business; neither was it void on the ground that it deprived a man of the right to labor at all times, or upon the ground that it was unreasonable in its requirements, in restraint of trade, or upon any other ground apparent upon the face of the ordinance.

Again, in Ex parte Moynier, 65 Cal. 33, the ordinance of the city and county of San Francisco which declared that no person or persons owning, or employed in, a public laundry or public wash-house, provided for in the 1st section of the order, should wash or iron clothes between the hours of 10 o'clock in the afternoon and 6 o'clock in the morning, nor upon any portion of the day known as Sunday, and also that it should be unlawful for any person to carry on such business within certain limits without the certificate of the health officer to sufficient drainage, and that the business could be carried on without injury to the sanitary condition of the neighborhood, and a certificate of the board of fire wardens that the heating appliances were in good condition and that their use was not dangerous to surrounding property, was held constitutional as within the police and sanitary regulations.

And in Ex parte Sisto Li Prototi, 68 Cal. 635, where the charter declared that "licenses shall be discriminating and proportionate to the amount of business," it was held that an ordinance making the license fee to be paid by the owners or keepers of laundries proportionate to the number of persons so employed and the amount of business done, was valid, although in that case there was a dissenting opinion by Justice Thornton holding that the ordinance was not in accord with the charter.

And again, in Ex parte White, 67 Cal. 102, an ordinance providing that all buildings erected and used as laundries within the corporate limits of the city and county should be constructed but one story in height with brick or stone walls not less than 12 inches in thickness, covered with a metal roof, and provided with metal or metal covered doors and window shutters, was held constitutional.

But in Re Wo Lee, 28 Fed. Rep. 471, it was held that the arbitrary power of a board of health under a municipal ordinance to give or refuse permits to carry on the laundry business was unconstitutional.

So, an ordinance of the city and county of San Francisco forbidding the establishment, maintenance, or carrying on of any laundry within certain limits without the consent of the board of supervisors, which consent was to be granted only upon the recommendation of not less than twelve citizens and taxpayers in the vicinity in which the laundry was to be established, and which vicinity embraced more than half the city and county, was held to be invalid by reason of the power of the supervisors being dependent upon the approval of others. Re Quong Woo, 13 Fed. Rep. 229, 231.

Again, a city ordinance which prohibits such a business in wooden buildings within a certain part of the city without the consent of a board of supervisors, not prohibiting such business in buildings erected in brick or stone, confers upon such authorities an arbitrary power, and is unconstitutional as an invalid exercise of police power and of the powers vested in the board of supervisors, by virtue of the California act of April 19, 1850, under which they are empowered inter alia, to provide by regulation for the prevention and summary removal of a nuisance for public health. Yick Wo v. Hopkins, 118 U. S. 373, 30 L. ed. 227, Reversing Re Yick Wo, 68 Cal. 294, 58 Am. Rep. 12.

Upon the question of discrimination generally, see note to Grossman v. Oakland (Or.) 36 L. R. A. 593.

In many cases, however, it has been sought to declare such trade or business a public nuisance and to abate it as such, and in this connection it has been said that the business of a laundry is not of itself against good morals or contrary to public order or decency, neither is it offensive to the senses or disturbing to the neighborhood where conducted, nor is it dangerous to the public safety or health. Re Quong Woo, 13 Fed. Rep. 229, 231; Re Yick Wo, 68 Cal. 294, 58 Am. Rep. 12.

And washing for hire cannot make the operation a nuisance, if it be not otherwise a nuisance. Stockton Laundry Case, 26 Fed. Rep. 611, 612.

So, a laundry cannot be deemed a nuisance per se being harmless in itself, and, if properly conducted with reference to sanitary and other conditions which may easily be complied with, is not offensive or dangerous to the health of the community in which it may be located, and such being the case a person has under the Constitution of the United States the same right to engage in the business of conducting a public laundry as in any other, and has equally with the grocer, the lawyer, or the carpenter the right to select the particular location in which he shall conduct such business. Re Hong Wah, 32 Fed. Rep. 623, 624.

Such a business is not a nuisance per se, neither is the occupation one that is prima facie a nuisance, like a slaughterhouse, or a house for the manufacture of gunpowder or dynamite. Stockton Laundry Case, 26 Fed. Rep. 611, 612.

The business of conducting a laundry is a lawful occupation, and is not of itself, and irrespective of the manner in which it is conducted, offensive or dangerous to the health of those living within the vicinity; and no municipal corporation has the power to make the right of a person to follow such business at any place he may select for that purpose dependent upon the will of any number of citizens or property owners within its limits, but a town or city may, when deemed necessary for the purpose of the public health or safety adopt reasonable regulations as to the manner in which such a business shall be conducted, and, in the exercise of its police power, may impose reasonable restrictions as to the kind of buildings to be used, and as to the sufficiency of the drainage, so as to prevent a nuisance arising therefrom. Ex parte Sing Lee, 93 Cal. 354, 357, 21 L. R. A. 193.

But a city ordinance which makes the carrying on of a laundry business a nuisance by the arbitrary declaration of the ordinance itself, is unconstitutional. Re Sam Kee, 31 Fed. Rep. 630.

An ordinance making it unlawful for any person to establish, maintain, or carry on the business of a public laundry or wash-house for hire within a city except within a part thereof lying without certain designated limits, and declaring any such laundry rience, pave the way for the introduction of contagion and its uncontrollable spread thereafter. Slaughterhouses, as ordinarily and perhaps invariably conducted in this country, might, within the limits of reasonable probability, be attended with these consequences. A competent legislative body has passed upon the question of fact involved, and we carried on in violation thereof to be a public nuisance, and making the violation of such ordinance a misdemeanor punishable by fine or imprisonment, or both, was held to be in conflict with § 1 of the 14th Amendment of the Constitution of the United States, inasmuch as it denied the right to select the particular locality in which the conducting of a lawful business not in itself a nuisance might be carried on. The court further held that such conflict was not removed by the fact that there were within the limits of the city outside of the district from which laundries were excluded places equally as well suited for their location as any within the district from which they are excluded. Re Hong Wah, 82 Fed. Rep. 623, 624.

So, a city ordinance which absolutely and unconditionally forbids the keeping of a laundry for washing clothes for hire, at any point within the inhabited, and even within the habitable, part of a city, the remainder of the city being in an uninhabitable condition, violates the constitutional provisions, and will not be enforced, upon the ground that such business constitutes a nuisance, such ordinance not regulating but extinguishing the business. Stockton Laundry Case, 26 Fed. Rep. 611-613.

Again, a rural city, not compactly built up, has no authority to prohibit within its inhabited limits the washing of clothes for hire, such occupation not only being useful but absolutely necessary in a civilized community; and it has no power to declare such occupation, and every other that may be followed by civilized man, to be a public nuisance without regard to the question whether it is in fact a nuisance or not. Stockton Laundry Case, 26 Fed. Rep. 611, 612.

And a laundry business carried on by the petitioner and his predecessors, at the location occupied by him for twenty years, and by the petitioner himself for eight years, in the absence of anything tending to show that it is in fact a nuisance, cannot be so declared under the provisions of a city ordinance declaring the carrying on of such business to be a nuisance, such ordinance being unconstitutional. Re Sam Kee, 31 Fed. Rep. 680.

Yet it has been said that, although the business of a laundry is not opposed to good morals or subversive of public order or decency, it may, when conducted in certain localities, be highly dangerous to the public safety so as to require its regulation by the terms of a city ordinance. Re Yick Wo, 68 Cal. 204, 58 Am. Rep. 12.

But a laundry established for the purpose of washing for hire can only become a nuisance upon gross negligence or carelessness, or gross imperfections in the arrangements and appliances by means of which it is carried on. Stockton Laundry Case, 26 Fed. Rep. 611-613.

So, if a laundry business is conducted in a manner offensive or dangerous or so as to become a nuisance, the public authorities may direct the manner to be changed and prescribe regulations for its prosecution. Re Quong Woo, 13 Fed. Rep. 229, 231.

And this is so for the reason that all businesses must be so conducted as not to endanger public safety and health. Re Quong Woo, 13 Fed. Rep. 229, 231.

But a city ordinance, providing that it shall be unlawful for any person to establish, maintain, or carry on the business of a public laundry or wash-house for hire within the city, except within a specified part thereof, and further declaring that any laundry so carried on in violation of such section 33 L. R. A.

shall be a nuisance, is within the power of the city to enact, the city having power to so restrict the business within the specified section of the city; and such ordinance is not unreasonable, it being a police or sanitary regulation. Re Hang Kie, 69 Cal. 149.

In Re Hong Wah, 82 Fed. Rep. 623, 625, the case of Re Hang Kie, 69 Cal. 149, was looked upon as virtually, although not expressly, overruled by the supreme court of the state, and was said ought not to be regarded as an authority upon the question. In that case a similar ordinance was upheld as a valid exercise of police power.

And if the structure or building in which the laundry business is carried on is by its structure, form, or material, unsafe, the public authorities may by proper proceedings have it altered or removed, such power being possessed with reference to all vocations and buildings in which they are prosecuted. Re Quong Woo, 13 Fed. Rep. 229, 231.

IV. Fertilizers.

It has been held that the manufacture of fish into scrap as a fertilizer is a nuisance per se. State v. Luco, 9 Houst. (Del.) 396.

In Czarniecki v. Bollman (Pa.) 10 Cent. Rep. 96, the defendant's business of a bone-boiling and fertilizing establishment was declared a nuisance per se and abated as such, for the reason that carrion cannot be gathered together in any populous neighborhood without being offensive; and the use of the buildings for such purposes was therefore restrained.

And the city authorities, after notice to the company by the street commissioners, may abate a fertilizer's business as a public nuisance by proceeding to destroy, break down, and injure, and otherwise abate the nuisance by force, and the court will refuse an injunction to restrain their proceedings, the summary process for the abatement of public nuisances being authorized by common law, the plaintiffs not showing damages irreparable at law. Manhattan Mfg. & Fertilizer Co. v. Van Keuren, 23 N. J. Eq. 251, 253.

Where the party charged with a nuisance had received a license from the board of health to carry on the business of manufacturing fertilizers, and sought to vindicate his action by virtue of such license, it was held that he was not entitled to carry on such business so as to create a nuisance, the license being no defense. Garrett v. State, 49 N. J. L. 103, 60 Am. Rep. 592.

So, in Northwestern Fertilizing Co. v. Hyde Park, 97 U. S. 659, 670, 24 L. ed. 1038, 1040, it was held that a charter authorizing the manufacture of animal matter into a fertilizer was not a contract guaranteeing in the locality originally selected exemption from the exercise of the police power of the state, however serious the nuisance might become in the future by reason of the growth in population around it, and therefore a village incorporated by a charter authorizing it to abate a nuisance might by an ordinance abate such nuisance.

As to the effect of an authority or license in general, see note to Grossman v. Oakland (Or.) 36 L. R. A. 593.

V. Livery stables.

Without attempting to exhaust the authorities upon the question as to whether or not, and how far, livery stables are nuisances, the note being confined to the consideration of municipal control over them as such, it may be stated that although a livery stable is not of itself a nuisance, yet when cannot go behind the finding. So far as we can know by this record, the power conferred has been exercised intelligently and in good faith." It must be borne in mind that the

situated in close proximity to private residences, and in a manner dangerous to the health and comfort of the residents of such houses, it may be declared a nuisance. Shiras v. Olinger, 50 Iowa, 571, 32 Am. Rep. 138; Flint v. Russell, 5 Dill. 151; St. Louis v. Russell, 116 Mo. 248, 20 L. R. A. 721; Dargan v. Waddill, 9 Ired. L. 244, 49 Am. Dec. 421; Kirkman v. Handy, 11 Humph. 406, 54 Am. Dec. 45; Keiser v. Lovett, 85 Ind. 240, 242, 44 Am. Rep. 10; Aldrich v. Howard, 7 R. I. 87, 80 Am. Dec. 636; Coker v. Birge, 10 Ga. 336; Rounsaville v. Kohlheim, 68 Ga. 668, 45 Am. Rep. 505; Shivry v. Streeper, 24 Fla. 103, 109; Burditt v. Swenson, 17 Tex. 489, 67 Am. Dec. 665; Harrison v. Brooks, 20 Ga. 537; Curtis v. Winslow, 38 Vt. 690.

It has been stated that the power of a city to regulate livery stables includes the right to designate the places, and in what parts of the town or city they may be located, and to prohibit their erection at any other place. St. Louis v. Russell, 116 Mo. 248, 20 L. R. A. 721.

A city charter giving power to pass ordinances to declare, prevent, and abate nuisances on public or private property, and the causes thereof, is sufficient to authorize an ordinance regulating the keeping of livery stables as being for public health and safety, even though the subdivision of the ordinance does not define livery stables, although it confers the power to prohibit the erection of an analogous establishment, with power to remove and regulate the same, and also power to regulate and prevent the carrying on of any business which may be dangerous or detrimental to the public health. State, Russell, v. Beattie, 16 Mo. App. 131.

But a mayor and municipal assembly, under a grant of power to declare nuisances, have no authority by ordinance to declare an existing livery stable a nuisance, such an act being the deprivation of property without due process of law and an invasion by the legislature of the powers of the judicial department of the government. State, Russell, v. Beattie, 16 Mo. App. 131.

Although in Chicago v. Stratton, 162 Ill. 494, 35 L. R. A. 84, 86, the main question involved was the delegation of municipal power to direct the location of livery stables to lotowners, yet the court stated that, although a livery stable in a city or town was not per se a nuisance, it might be injurious to the comfort and even health of the occupants by the permeation of deleterious gases, and by the mere deposit of offal removed therefrom, if situated in close proximity to an existing residence. To the same effect, Shiros v. Olinger, 50 Iowa, 571, 32 Am. Rep. 138; Dargan v. Waddill, 9 Ired. L. 244, 49 Am. Dec. 421; Burditt v. Swenson, 17 Tex. 489, 67 Am. Dec. 665; Green v. Lake, 54 Miss. 404, 28 Am. Rep. 873; Kirkman v. Handy, 11 Humph. 406, 54 Am. Dec. 45.

In Brookline v. Hatch, 187 Mass. 380, 36 L. R. A. 495, an injunction was sought to restrain the defendant from using or occupying certain premises and buildings thereon for a stable, contrary to the provisions of the Massachusetts statute, which prohibited the use of such premises as stables for more than four horses in certain specified buildings without a license, but the question did not turn upon the point of nuisance, the decision being mainly to the point as to what constituted a place within the meaning of the statute.

VI. Brick and lime kilns.

A brick kiln is not a nuisance per se although it may become such by the growth of the surrounding neighborhood. State, Horscottle, v. St. Louis 88 L. R. A.

Bd. of Health, 16 Mo. App. 8; Huckensstine's Appeal, 70 Pa. 106, 10 Am. Rep. 669.

So, brickmaking is not of itself a noxious or offensive trade, business, or manufacture, within § 64 of the English public health act of 1848, so as to call for its abatement as a nuisance, by a local board under the provisions of such statute. Wanstead Local Bd. of Health v. Hill, 13 C. B. N. S. 473, 32 L. J. M. C. N. S. 135, 9 Jur. N. S. 972, 7 L. T. N. S. 744, 11 Week. Rep. 368.

And brickburning, which is an essential part of brickmaking, is not a nuisance per se. Huckensstine's Appeal, 70 Pa. 102, 106, 10 Am. Rep. 669.

A city ordinance prohibiting a brick kiln from being located within a certain distance of any dwelling house without certain consents, passed under its charter which authorizes the city authorities to declare, prevent, and abate nuisances, covers a brick kiln in operation at the time of the charter, the provisions of the ordinance not saying or implying that existing brick kilns within the limits of the city are to be allowed to remain, no matter what changes may have taken place in the locality in which they exist, and whether they become nuisances or not. State, Horscottle, v. St. Louis Bd. of Health, 16 Mo. App. 8.

It has been held that the burning of lime, irrespective of location, is neither an unlawful business nor a nuisance per se, but is a useful and necessary process for the benefit of society, although it may from mere local conditions become a nuisance. State v. Mott, 61 Md. 297, 48 Am. Rep. 105. To the same effect, Slight v. Gutzlaff, 35 Wis. 673, 676, 17 Am. Rep. 476.

A city ordinance, passed pursuant to the power contained in art. 4, § 797, of the Maryland Code, Public Local Laws, which makes it unlawful for any person or persons to work, operate, or continue in use, for the purpose of burning oyster shells or stone lime, any kiln situated or erected within the limits of such city, under certain penalties for each and every day such kiln is worked, operated, or continued in use, is invalid, inasmuch as it prohibits the entire industry of lime burning within the limits of the city, even though the kiln may be on the remotest outskirts of the city, beyond the reach of habitations, the same not then being, and the evidence not showing that it ever would become, a nuisance, the health of the city not being affected in any manner. State v. Mott, 61 Md. 297, 48 Am. Rep. 105.

In Reynolds v. Schultz, 34 How. Pr. 147, an order had been made by the metropolitan board of health directing the suspension of the business of manufacturing shell lime conducted by the plaintiff on certain premises in the city of New York until the mode of conducting such business should be so altered as that no odors could escape into the open air, and directing that certain materials consisting of shells and other substances should be removed, and such premises cleaned. The plaintiff denied that his premises or the business carried on thereon were a nuisance detrimental to life or health, and offered to establish the fact before any tribunal acting according to the ordinary course of the law. The defendants, the board of health, alleged that they had filed sufficient proof as to the premises and business to authorize its declaration that the same were in a condition and in effect dangerous to life and health and a public nuisance, and made abatable after notice. The court upheld the proceedings of the board, the same not appearing to be arbitrary or more summary than its authority called for. the preponderance of evidence being in

Simonton, 43 Cal. 249, which involved the constitutionality of an ordinance of the board of supervisors of San Francisco prohibiting the feeding of still slops to milch cows, the court says: "If it indeed be a fact that the milk of cows, fed in whole or in part upon still slops, is unwholesome as human food, there can be no doubt of either the authority support of their contention that the same was a nuisance.

VII. Stockyards.

The council of a city of the second class has power to declare those annoyances peculiar to stockyards and hog-pens nuisances, whenever they become offensive to the public. Burlington v. Stockwell, 5 Kan. App. 569.

The fact that a stockyard company authorized to operate a railroad through a city for the transportation of freight creates a nuisance by the transportation of live stock, or other substances injurious to the public health and general welfare, does not justify the municipal authorities in removing the tracks of such company from the streets as a means of abating such nuisance, thereby destroying the value of its road. Chicago v. Union Stock Yards & T. Co. 164 Ill. 224.

Where the compiled laws of the state provide that the council may purchase, or condemn, and hold for the city within, or within 5 miles outside of the city limits, all necessary lands for hospital purposes and waterworks, and erect, establish, and regulate hospitals, workhouses, and poorhouses, and gives power to make regulations for the government and support of the same and to secure the general health of the city, and to prevent and remove nuisances, the police jurisdiction of the city thereby extending over such lands and property to the same extent as over public cemeteries, the city has no power under such act to condemn as a nuisance a stock yard kept by the defendant within 3 miles of the corporate limits of the city, the lands upon which such nuisance exists not being used for the purposes designated by the act. State, Humphrey, v. Franklin, 40 Kan. 410.

By § 4089 of the Iowa Code the act of keeping a stock yard in such a condition as to constitute a nuisance is declared a nuisance, and under § 456 of the Code power is given to prevent injury or annoyance from anything dangerous, offensive, or unhealthy, and to cause any nuisance to be abated; yet it has been held that a city has no authority by its ordinance to provide for the imposition of fines against persons committing such a nuisance as defined by the ordinance, the power of the city being limited to providing for the abatement of such nuisances. Knoxville v. Chicago, B. & Q. R. Co., 83 Iowa, 638.

See also, as bearing upon the establishment of stock yards, the Slaughter-House Cases, 83 U. S. 16 Wall. 36, 21 L. ed. 394, supra, II.

VIII. Tallow, fat, hides, etc.

In Zylstra v. Charleston, 1 Bay, 382, the proceedings of the city council under their ordinance prohibiting the keeping of a tallow chandler shop within the city, for which the defendant was fined, were held to be coram non judge and void.

In Rankett's Case, Pasch. 3 Ja. B. R. cited in 16 Vin. Abr. 23, it was said that the making of candles which caused a noisome scent to the inhabitants was not a nuisance because of the needfulness of them, which dispensed with the noisomeness of the smell. In Hawkins' Pleas of the Crown, 190, chap. 75, fol. 10, the same case is cited, but the author takes exception to the reasonableness of the opinion because whatever necessity there might be for candles to be made yet it could not be pretended to make them in a town, and that, as a trade of a brewer which was as necessary as that of a chandler carried on in an inconvenient place and so as to incommode the neighborhood had been held to be a nuisance, so ought the chandler's shop.

Yet it has been held that a tallow furnace erected in a populous neighborhood is a nuisance. Morley v. Pragnel, Cro. Car. 510; Tohoyles's Case, cited in Cro. Car. 510.

In Allen v. State, 84 Tex. 230, 233, it is stated that it requires no aid of the common law to convince anyone accustomed to pure air, and who has been brought by accident or necessity within the sickening and malarious influence of a modern tallow and beef factory, that it is a nuisance, especially when it is a disgusting and nauseous nuisance even for miles around it; and therefore any person who, knowing the effect of that business, will erect a beef or tallow factory in the vicinity of a town or city or in a thickly settled neighborhood or on a public thoroughfare of the highway is guilty of creating a nuisance and liable therefor.

So, in Grand Rapids v. Weiden, 97 Mich. 82, a rendering establishment where tallow was tried out from slaughterhouses and meat-market offal, which offal was more or less decomposed on its arrival, and the accumulation of the matter and the aggregation of large quantities of bones from which the marrow had not been entirely extracted, and in which manure was allowed to be accumulated, and large quantities of hogs were kept about the premises running in an inclosure and fed with a mixture which came from the bones, it was held that such facts, together with the crudity of the rendering process, all of which created an intolerable stench which permeated the neighborhood, and was borne by every breeze through the entire section of the city, and caused, nausea, debility, and discomfort, compelling citizens to shut their doors and windows, was a public nuisance abatable by the public authorities.

In Winslow v. Bloomington, 24 Ill. App. 647, the defendant's soap factory and tallow chandlery emitted and gave out bad, offensive, and unwholesome smells and odors to the annoyance and detriment of the community. It was held proper to charge the jury that if such business could not be carried on without emitting such odors so as to be detrimental and offensive to the people in its locality, then the owner of such factory had no right to carry it on in a populous city, and that it was no defense to say that it was conducted as well as it could be. In this case the defendant had violated a city ordinance preventing the erection of such establishments and declaring them nuisances.

A fat rendering establishment so far as it proves hazardous to the public health is abatable by the board of health under N. J. stat. 1887 (N. J. Pub. Laws 1887, p. 80). State, Board of Health, v. Neidt (N. J.) 19 Atl. 318.

So, a melting house erected for the purpose of trying animal fat from a slaughterhouse is prima facie a nuisance. Peck v. Elder, 3 Sandf. 128, 132.

And the trades of soap boiling, calendering, and brewing, though lawful, yet if carried on to the annoyance of the neighborhood, are nuisances. King v. Pierce, 2 Show. 329.

In Seacord v. People, 121 Ill. 623, 632, where it was sought to charge the defendant with unlawfully and wilfully suffering the carcasses of dead animals and large quantities of offal, filth, and noisome substances to be collected and deposited near certain dwelling houses so as to amount to a common nuisance, the court stated that in determining whether such establishments which belonged to the class denominated prima facie nuisances were nuisances in fact, the location whether convenient or otherwise, as well as the management and the ef-or the duty of the board to enact the ordinance in question, and the scientific correctness of the determination by the board of the matter of fact involved is not open to inquiry here." In the case of Re Jacobs, 93 N. Y. 93, 50 Am. Rep. 636, the court declares the following rule for testing the validity of ordinances enacted under the police power of a fact produced on the neighborhood, must be considered.

An ordinance prohibiting a cremator or soap-boiling manufacture within the limits of a borough incorporated under Pa. act April 3, 1851, without the consent of the authorities, was upheld in Schrack v. Coatesville, 19 Pa. Co. Ct. 334, as it was likely to prove noxious or offensive to the inhabitants, the act of incorporation giving the borough power to pass such ordinances.

A fat boiling establishment carried on within a city so that offensive odors escape into the external air is a public nuisance per se which may be summarily abated by a metropolitan board of health, after a notice given to suppress and abate the nuisance has been disregarded, an opportunity to be heard having been given. Well v. Schultz, 33 How. Pr. 7, 8.

This is so for the reason that it is enough to create a public nuisance that the enjoyment of life within the house is made uncomfortable whether it be by infecting the air with noxious smells or with gases injurious to health. Well v. Schultz, 33 How. Pr. 7, 8.

In Baugh v. Sheriff, 7 Phila. 82, the proceedings of the board of health in declaring, by resolution, the plaintiff's fat-boiling and hide-curing establishment a nuisance were held not to be sufficient to authorize such board to abate the same as a nuisance, as under the Pennsylvania act of 1818, the complaint must be made upon the oath or affirmation of two householders, and a warrant must be obtained from a justice of the peace directing the sheriff or his deputy, by virtue thereof, to enter upon the premises and determine the question of a nuisance.

In Westheimer v. Schultz, 33 How. Pr. 11, the court refused to proceed by way of injunction to restrain the proceedings of the board of health in abating the plaintiff's fat-melting establishment as a nuisance, upon the ground that the public health of the city required that the board of health abate such nuisance.

In order to sustain a prosecution under N. Y. Laws 1892, chap. 646, the carrying on the business of a fat rendering establishment, etc., as a public nuisance within the corporate limits of the city, it must be shown that such business is carried on as a public nuisance. People v. Rosenberg, 138 N. Y. 410, 415.

The business of storing green and dried hides or pelts within a city may become a nuisance, but it is not a nuisance per se. May v. People, 1 Colo. App. 157, 159.

Yet neither a street commissioner nor a board of health, in the absence of any city ordinance defining what circumstances of abuse shall render certain specified occupations obnoxious, has power to abate a tannery as a nuisance until it has been found to be such. State, Marshall, v. Cadwalader, 36 N. J. L. 233, 235.

In a case where the board of health, in the exercise of their powers, sought absolutely to prohibit the plaintiff's business of salting and curing hides and dealing in rough fat, the court restrained the action of the public authorities and confined their interference to such interruptions as were reasonably necessary to enable them to abate any nuisance he might create in conducting such business, which was lawful and not a nuisance per se. Well v. Ricord, 24 N. J. Eq. 169, 173.

And as the business of a tannery and skin-dressing establishment is not per se a nuisance, it requires acts of a judicial nature to determine 88 L. R. A.

whether such an occupation, lawful in itself, is so conducted as to become liable to abatement. State, Marshall, v. Cadwalader, 36 N. J. L. 233, 235.

The resolution of a city council, acting under the city ordinance, directing the street commissioner to cause the owner or occupant of premises used as a hide-curing establishment to discontinue such use, and on his failure to do so to close the premises as a public nuisance, is valid, such ordinance preserving the health and promoting the comfort, convenience, and general welfare of the inhabitants. Kennedy v. Phelps, 10 La. Ann. 227.

Yet a city ordinance is discriminating and therefore not within the authority conferred upon the municipal authorities by § 3312, subdivisions 45 and 53 of the Colorado General Statutes, where it prohibits the keeping and storing of green or dried hides or pelts within the city without the permission from the city council, as it does not declare the storing of hides and pelts within the city limits a nuisance, but assumes that the city council may prohibit, by declining to grant permission, or may grant permission as their inclination may prompt. May v. People, 1 Colo. App. 157, 159.

So, under the powers given to a common council to make, modify, amend, or repeal ordinances, rules, and regulations to abate or remove nuisances of every kind, and to require the owner or occupant of any grocery, cellar, tallow chandler's shop, butcher's stall, soap factory, or tannery, or other offensive or unwholesome house or place, to cleanse, remove, or abate the same, such council cannot abate every grocery, butcher's stall, or tannery, and such places are secure against interference or restraint until they are adjudged to be so employed as to be inimical to public health or safety, or until their owners contravene some ordinance prescribing the mode in which they shall be used, thereby making them nuisances. State, Marshall, v. Cadwalader, 36 N. J. L. 233, 235.

And a board of health cannot by resolution, after declaring the business of a skin dresser to be a nuisance, and notifying the owner to remove, correct, or abate the same within a given time, empower the street commissioners to proceed to abate the same, no such power existing, the act not having been declared a public nuisance by the common council, who have no power to delegate the right to pass upon the question to the street commissioners, the board of health, in the absence of an ordinance defining what circumstances of abuse render such occupation obnoxious, having no power in the question, the clause in the charter giving the city council power to appoint a board of health containing no warrant for the council to delegate to or confer upon such board the power which the council were called upon to exercise. State, Marshall, v. Cadwalader, 36 N. J. L. 233, 236.

The order of a board of health prohibiting the trade or employment of the business of preparing tripe, and other trades of a similar nature, is a valid exercise of the power conferred upon the board by § 52, Mass. Gen. Stat. chap. 24, the board acting in behalf of all the inhabitants; § 55 of the same statute giving express power to take all necessary measures to prevent the exercise of any trade in violation of its order; and for that purpose such a board may, without special authority, bring suit in the name of the city to restrain such business. Taunton v. Taylor, 116 Mass. 234, 231.

A complaint which charges the defendant with keeping a large quantity of hides, tallow, and other substances emitting a disagreeable odor, but municipality: "When a health law is challenged in the courts as unconstitutional on the ground that it arbitrarily interferes with personal liberty and private property without due process of law, the courts must be able to see that it has at least in fact some relation to the public health, that the public health is the end actually aimed at, and that it is appropriate and not apprising him of the fact whether he is to answer a public or a private nuisance, the facts themselves not constituting a nuisance either public or private, is erroneous, and a judgment thus rendered in favor of a municipality will be reversed and the case remanded. Lippman v. South Bend, 84 Ind. 276, 279.

In First Municipality v. Blinneau, 8 La. Ann. 688, a city council, with the approval of the mayor, directed the defendant's business of a soap factory to be removed within twenty days, unless it should be put in such condition as not to be a nuisance, and further ordered that at the expiration of such period, on complaint of three inhabitants under oath that the factory was, and continued to be, a nuisance, the proprietor or any persons interested therein should be fined. The court held that, even conceding the power of the city council to impose fines for the violation of an ordinance, and the duty of the municipal government to maintain by lawful means the cleanliness and salubrity of the city, yet the resolution of the council was illegal and could not be enforced.

But in Winslow v. Bloomington, 24 Ill. App. 647, the defendant's business of a soap manufacturer carried on in connection with that of a tallow chandler was held properly declared and abated as a nuisance where it produced bad, offensive, and unwholesome smells and odors to the annoyance of the neighboring community.

See also, as bearing upon this branch of the subject, Dubois v. Budlong, 15 Abb. Pr. 445, 446; McKnight v. Toronto, 3 Ont. Rep. 284; Ex parte Shradler, 83 Cal. 279, 284; Bourland v. Hildreth, 26 Cal. 162; St. Paul v. Byrnes, 38 Minn. 176, 177.

IX. Dairies.

A city ordinance which prohibits the keeping of a dairy within certain limits, and gives the city authorities power to grant permission for the keeping of the same within such limits, is void as prohibiting a lawful business, for the reason that such business if carried on without such permission would be declared a nuisance, while if carried on with such permission it could not be declared a nuisance, even though the business in both cases might be perfectly harmless and in no way detrimental to public health. State v. Mahner, 43 La. Ann. 496. To the same effect, State v. Dulaney, 43 La. Ann. 500.

Where the nuisance which it sought to abate is a dairy, which is not a nuisance either by law or ordinance, and is not such per se, the decision of the board of health making it such is not conclusive. St. Louis v. Schnuckelberg, 7 Mo. App. 540.

As to the validity of a city ordinance requiring vendors of milk to furnish gratuitously on application of the sanitary inspectors samples of the milk for inspection and analysis, see State v. Dupaquier (La. Ann.) 26 L. R. A. 162.

And upon the question of the validity of an ordinance providing for the destruction of milk found to be impure, see Deems v. Baltimore (Md.) 28 L. R. A. 541.

X. Pawnbrokers, junk and secondhand clothes dealers.

Upon the question of police power as exercised by municipalities over the business of pawn brokers, junk dealers, and dealers in secondhand clothes, see note to Grand Rapids v. Brady (Mich.) 82 L. R. A. 116; State v. Taft (N. C.) 82 L. R. A. 122; Rosenbaum v. Newbern (N. C.) 82 L. R. A. 123.

An ordinance making it unlawful to import into 88 L. R. A.

any town any secondhand clothing, garment, cloth, or bed furniture, for the purpose of selling or offering it for sale, is void as an attempt absolutely to prohibit a lawful business not in itself necessarily a nuisance, but which may be conducted without danger to the community when properly regulated. State v. Taft (N. C.) 82 L. R. A. 122.

XI. Miscellaneous trades.

An ordinance of a city passed pursuant to the authority of the general assembly, prohibiting the cultivation of rice within the city limits, declaring it injurious to health, and giving power to remove and destroy the same, upon the ground of its being a nuisance, is a valid exercise of the police power, the municipal authorities having full power to declare it, and abate it as a public nuisance. Green v. Savannah, 6 Ga. 1.

In Prescott's Case, 2 N. Y. City Hall Rec. 161, the defendant's distillery with large furnaces emitting large quantities of smoke was held to be a common nuisance to the public.

The trade of a varnish maker, from which offensive smells are emitted annoying persons passing along the road, is a public nuisance, and it is not necessary that such smells should be injurious to health in order to constitute such nuisance, but it is sufficient that they are offensive to the senses. Rex v. Neil, 2 Car. & P. 483.

Under § 665 of the Civil Code of Louisiana, which provides that if the works or material of any manufactory or other operation are an inconvenience to those in the same or in the neighboring houses by diffusing smoke or noxious smell, no servitude being established by which they are regulated, their sufferance must be determined by the rules of the police or the customs of the place, a city ordinance condemning a blacksmith shop as a nuisance is valid, and an injunction will be granted to restrain the owner of such premises from continuing it. New Orleans v. Lambert, 14 La. Ann. 244.

A gas company carrying on business under authority derived from the legislature which in the course of such business occasions unwholesome smells, smoke, and stench, is not liable for a public nuisance where it is shown that due care and diligence are used in the business. People v. New York Gaslight Co. 64 Barb. 55, 66.

When gas, furnished by a gas company, becomes a dangerous and offensive nuisance by reason of defective pipes, a municipal corporation has power to prohibit its continuance, and therefore the court will dissolve an injunction obtained by such company restraining the municipal authorities from abating the nuisance. Butler's Appeal (Pa.) 1 Cent. Rep. 594.

Upon the question of liability in the escape and explosion of gas, see note to Ohio Gas Fuel Co. v. Andrews (Ohio) 29 L. R. A. 337; Lebanon Light, Heat, & Power Co. v. Leap (Ind.) 29 L. R. A. 342, and McGahan v. Indianapolis Natural Gas Co. (Ind.) 29 L. R. A. 355.

Where, by the terms of its charter, the city has power not only to abate but also to define nuisances, the fact that the defendant, in preparing a rock-crushing machine, makes use of the most modern appliances, and thereby reduces its offensiveness and annoying character to the minimum is no defense to the charge brought against him under the city ordinance for the maintaining of a nuisance. Kansas v. McAleer, 81 Mo. App. 433, 436; State v. Boll, 59 Mo. 321.

A city ordinance making the keeping or raising adapted to that end." Tried by this rule, the ordinance in question fairly and fully fills the requirements of the law. It cannot be urged that petitioner is deprived of his property without due process of law, for, as is said by Judge Dillon in his work upon Municipal Corporations (§ 141), in speaking of police and sanitary regulations: "It is well settled that laws and regulations of this character, though they may disturb the enjoyment of individual rights, are not unconstitutional, though no provision is made for compensation for such disturbances. They do not appropriate private property for public use, but simply regulate its use and enjoyment by the owner. If he suffers injury, it is either damnum absque injuria, or, in the theory of the law, he is compensated for it by sharing in the general benefits which the regulations are intended and calculated to secure." This ordinance is not unreasonable nor arbitrary nor discriminating. It treats all persons alike who are engaged in the business named therein. All have the same rights, and all are subject to the same burdens. It is not unreasonable in the limits of distance fixed. As to the location of the exact spot distant from a church or a schoolhouse or a dwelling house, where an ordinance would cease to be reasonable, it is not for this court now to say. The limits here prescribed are those with which we are to deal, and those limitations of distance may well be said to be reasonable. We see no substantial objection that can be made to the validity of this ordinance. Upon the contrary, the subject-matter covered by it is clearly one with which the city had the constitutional right to deal, and the businesses there enumerated are unmistakably those which the municipal authorities had the right to regulate, in the interest of the comfort and good health of the people of the city. The power is vested in the city, by direct grant from the Constitution, to control and regulate business undertakings of the character here involved, and petitioner's constitutional rights have in no way been trespassed upon.

It is therefore ordered that petitioner be remanded.

We concur: McFarland, J.; Harrison, J.; Van Fleet, J.; Temple, J.

of bees within the city a nuisance is too broad and therefore invalid, as neither the keeping, owning, nor raising of bees is in itself a nuisance, the ordinance having no regard to the fact whether the act is a nuisance or not, or whether bees in general have become a nuisance in the city. Arkadelphia v. Clark, 52 Ark. 23.

A fish-frying business which is, as a fact, an offensive business by reason of effluvia arising therefrom extending to a distance of 200 or 300 yards is not a noxious or offensive business within the meaning of § 112 of the English public health act of 1875, which only applies where a business is "necessarily obnoxious or offensive." Braintree Local Bd. of Health v. Boyton, 52 L. T. N. S. 90, 48 J. P. 582.

An order of the board of selectmen of the town acting as a board of health prohibiting the manufacture of kerosene or other oils within the town as a nuisance dangerous to public health is valid, and legal under Mass. Gen. Stat. chap. 62, § 52. Winthrop v. Farrar, 11 Allen, 308. E. W.

MICHIGAN SUPREME COURT.

SUPREME LODGE, KNIGHTS OF PYTHIAS, Appl.,

v.

IMPROVED ORDER, KNIGHTS OF PYTHIAS et al.

(.....Mich.....)

1. The name "Improved Order, Knights of Pythias," can be lawfully taken as the name of a new order formed by members who withdraw from the Knights of Pythias chiefly because the old order refuses to permit them to have the ritual printed in the German language.
2. The Supreme Lodge, Knights of Pythias, which becomes incorporated after the words "Knights of Pythias" had been used by the order as an existing voluntary society cannot claim any greater right to that name than the order of which it is the head.

(May 28, 1897.)

A PPEAL by complainant from a decree of the Circuit Court for Wayne County dismissing a bill filed to enjoin defendants from infringing the plaintiffs' name, ritual, and jewels. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. Phillip T. Colgrove and John C. Burns, for appellant:

The complainant is a legal entity, incorporated by special act of Congress, June 29, 1894.

In the autonomy of the order Knights of Pythias neither a grand lodge nor a subordinate lodge can be organized or exist except by warrant or charter issued by either the supreme lodge of the order or by a grand lodge of a grand domain. Grand lodges exist only by charter issued by the supreme lodge, and subordinate lodges not under the control of a grand lodge exist only by warrant or charter from the supreme lodge.

An individual, subordinate, or grand lodge could not maintain this action because the wrongs complained of are wrongs affecting all the members and lodges of the supreme jurisdiction and the action should be brought in the name of that body representing all those members and lodges, that is by the complainant.

Unless expressly forbidden by the Constitution, state legislatures can create corporations for any purpose.

Bacon, Ben. Soc. ¶ 42.

Congress recognized the organization or fraternity for whose benefit the act was passed in incorporating as it did the supreme representative body of that order, whose existence was a matter within common knowledge; and the courts will take judicial notice of the fact that every organization whose proportions have assumed those of the order of Knights of Pythias has a supreme lodge.

Societies of this nature are much favored, and are considered as peculiarly under the protection of the legislature and the courts of justice.

Pearce v. Piper, 17 Ves. Jr. 19.

The name "Knights of Pythias" belongs to the general corporation. The general corporation adopted and used the ritual. The books containing the ritual are the private property of the order of Knights of Pythias.

Clearly any cause of action arising from the use of the name "Knights of Pythias" or of the ritual mentioned in the complaint, ought to be brought by the corporation which has that name, and which adopted the ritual and in which is the private and exclusive property of the books containing the ritual.

In no case inter partes has the court of last resort ever held that a complainant corporation could restrain the use of its name by others, on the ground of mere confusion. It was necessary for the complainant to show, in addition, that its trade or other business for gain or profit would be injured by the alleged wrongful conduct of the defendant.

London & P. Law Assur. Soc. v. London & P. Joint-Stock L. Ins. Co. 11 Jur. 938.

Montgomery, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

Complainant filed a bill for an injunction, praying that defendants be restrained from using the ritual and jewels of the order of the Knights of Pythias, and from using the name "Improved Order, Knights of Pythias." A careful examination of the authorities cited by counsel, and of the reasons urged by them, has failed to convince us that the learned trial judge erred in dismissing the bill. The opinion of Judge Carpenter contains so full a review of the case, and its reasoning is so satisfactory, that we adopt it as our own. That opinion is as follows:

"The Knights of Pythias is a secret unincorporated society, organized in 1864, and has about 500,000 members. Complainant is the Supreme Lodge of the Knights of Pythias, and was incorporated by special act of Congress in 1894. The Improved Order, Knights of Pythias is also a secret, unincorporated society, and had June 30, 1895, when the last report was made, 1,738 members. It was formed in December, 1894, by former members of the Knights of Pythias. These last-mentioned members left the old order, and formed the new, because a convention of the Supreme Lodge, Knights of Pythias, in August, 1894, declared that 'henceforth and forevermore the ritual used in this and all other English-speaking countries shall be printed in the English language only.' Both orders are fraternal and benevolent. They have many resemblances. The important difference between them, as already indicated, is this: The ritual of the improved order may be printed in German, while that of the Knights of Pythias cannot be. Complainant asks an injunction restraining defendants from using the name 'Improved Order, Knights of Pythias,' and from using the name 'Knights of Pythias,' or any derivative thereof, and from printing or using any ritual in substance like that used by the Knights of Pythias. There is no proof that the defendants' ritual is so nearly like complainant's as to justify the interference of a court. The sole question is, then, whether defendants shall be enjoined from using the name 'Improved Order Knights of Pythias.' Complainant's counsel insist that by the act incorporating complainant as 'Supreme Lodge, Knights of Pythias' an exclusive right to the name 'Knights of Pythias' was acquired. Numerous cases are cited holding that a corporation has an exclusive right to its name. No case, however, is cited holding that incorporation gives an exclusive right to a name already in use as the name 'Knights of Pythias' was, by an existing voluntary society. On the contrary, McGlynn v. Post, 21 Abb. N. C. 97, cited by complainant's counsel, and Black Rabbit Assn. v. Munday, 21 Abb. N. C. 99, hold that in such a case an exclusive right is not acquired. Indeed if complainant, by incorporating, acquired the exclusive right to the name 'Knights of Pythias,' it could at will compel the order of which it is only the head, and all other lodges, subordinate and grand, to cease using the name 'Knights of Pythias.' It seems clear, therefore, that complainant did not, by becoming a corporation, acquire the exclusive right to the name 'Knights of Pythias,' and that, whatever are its rights, they cannot exceed those of the order of which it is the head. The question, then, arises, Are the rights of the order violated? Nearly all the members who withdrew from the old order and went into the new are Germans, and many of them are unable to read and understand a ritual not printed in German. Prior to the action of the order which was the occasion of their withdrawal, the order furnished for their use, and they used, rituals printed in German. Defendants therefore withdrew from the society of which they were members, because it changed, not because it continued, its policy. The propriety of the conduct of complainant in forbidding the printing of the ritual in German, the propriety of the conduct of defendants in withdrawing from the order, are questions solely for the consideration of the parties themselves. The Knights of Pythias had a lawful right to declare that its ritual should be printed only in English, and defendants had an equally lawful right to found an order whose ritual might be printed in German. Having formed this order, is it possible that defendants cannot give it an appropriate name, a name which will properly describe it? This new order is formed by the members of the Knights of Pythias who withdrew from the Knights of Pythias because that order changed its policy in a matter which it must be presumed they thought important. This order resembles the Knights of Pythias. It stands to these members in the place which the Knights of Pythias has vacated. To a certain extent it carries out a policy which the Knights of Pythias formerly carried out and abandoned. Complainant charges that the defendants have seceded from it, and have established a rival and very similar organization. No name could appropriately be adopted, under these circumstances, which did not contain the words 'Knights of Pythias,' because no name could properly describe it, either by reference to its origin, its history, or its purposes, which did not contain those words. Suppose that this new order had received some other name. It would have been none the less, in the minds of complainant, a seceding faction of the Knights of Pythias; it would have been none the less, to defendants, a substitute for the Knights of Pythias; and it would have been none the less, to the impartial historian, an offshoot of the Knights of Pythias. One excellent test of an appropriate name to select under such circumstances is furnished by the history of schisms in other societies. Nearly all our varieties of churches of the same denomination are the results of secession or withdrawals from the parent church of that name, and it has been the usual course for the new church society to adopt as a permanent part of its name the name of the parent organization. Take one instance: A part of the Methodist Episcopal Church withdrew and established the Protestant Methodist Church. So we have the Order of Foresters of America, formerly the Ancient Order of Foresters of America; the Canadian Order of Foresters; the Independent Order of Foresters,—all of which are, as I understand, offshoots of the Ancient Order of Foresters of England. No one has ever questioned the appropriateness of using the parent name as a part of the name of a new society formed under these circumstances, so far as I can learn. To my mind, it is clear therefore, that defendants, in naming their order, not only could, but were almost bound, in order to properly describe it, to make use of the words 'Knights of Pythias.' Of course, there is this limitation: Defendant should not use a name so much like the name of the order from which they have withdrawn as to work a damage to that order. The only way that the order can be damaged, as the least reflection will prove, is by depriving it of members who would otherwise join it. Let us apply to this case the principles by which courts determine similar controversies of trading concerns. The decisive principle is this: 'No man has a right to sell or advertise his own business or goods as those of another.' Williams v. Farrand, 88 Mich. 478, 14 L. R. A. 161. 'One must not, therefore, adopt a name so similar to that of another as to draw to himself business intended for that other.' Chas. S. Higgins Co. v. Higgins Soap Co. 144 N. Y. 462, 27 L. R. A. 43; Tallcot v. Moore, 6 Hun, 106; Potter v. McPherson, 21 Hun, 559; Holmes, B. & H. v. Holmes, B. & A. Mfg. Co. 37 Conn. 296, 9 Am. Rep. 324. The correct principle is stated in complainant's brief (page 71) as a quotation from the opinion of Judge Foster, of the superior court of Vanderburgh county, Indiana, rendered in the suit of St. George Lodge, K. of P. v. Rosenthal. 'Where a corporation has appropriated and used a name for such length of time as to become identified by the name, and had established a character and reputation under it, it is a fraud upon the corporation and the public if this name be assumed by others under such circumstances as would lead the public to believe that they constitute the original corporation; and where injury will result to the corporation on account thereof, courts of equity will, at the suit of the injured parties, by injunction restrain the further perpetration of the wrong. It is the special injury to the party aggrieved and the imposition upon the public that constitute the wrong which the courts will redress. It is not necessary that the wrong should be intentionally committed. It is enough that the name should be used under such circumstances as would lead the public to believe that the latter organization was the former, and thereby cause injury to the former corporation.'

"Where one uses the name of another for the fraudulent purpose of attracting to himself business which belongs to that other, no injustice will be done if the court assumes that the name chosen accomplishes this purpose, even though the resemblance be not great. If one intends that the name he has chosen shall be believed to be that of another, it is fair to infer that he will so use that name as to promote the desired belief. Accordingly we find that the motives with which a name is chosen, and the circumstances attending its use, as well as the similarity of names, have a bearing in determining whether business is liable to be diverted, and, consequently, whether the courts shall interfere. Compare Myers v. Kalamazoo Brigg Co. 54 Mich. 215, 52 Am. Rep. 811, and Williams v. Farrand, 88 Mich. 479, 14 L. R. A. 161. See also Chas. S. Higgins Co. v. Higgins Soap Co. 144 N. Y. 471, 27 L. R. A. 42. Where the name was not chosen for the purpose of deception, and has not been used under circumstances intended or calculated to deceive, the similarity of names must be such as to deceive ordinary persons proceeding with ordinary care to justify the interference of a court. High. Inj. § 1888; Seizo v. Provezende, L. R. 1 Ch. 192; McLean v. Fleming, 96 U. S. 251, 24 L. ed. 880. There is not a particle of evidence in the case that defendants chose the name, 'Improved Order, Knights of Pythias' with the intention that their order should be supposed to be the order Knights of Pythias, nor that they have done anything since the order was founded to lead the public to believe that the orders were the same. On the contrary, the official communications issued by defendants, some of which are set up in complainant's bill, inform all who read them that their order is not the Knights of Pythias, but is a separate, and, they claim, an improved, order. Defendants seem quite as anxious as complainant to have it understood that their order is not the Knights of Pythias. This, then, is the test: Is the name 'Improved Order Knights of Pythias' so nearly like the name 'Knights of Pythias' that ordinary persons using ordinary care would think them identical, would think them two names for the same order, or for branches of the same order, so that they would become members of the defendants' society when they really wanted to join complainant's society? In considering 88 L. R. A.

this question, it should be borne in mind that no complaint is or can be made on account of any damage resulting from the fact that the defendant society is a rival and competing organization, and that the founders of an order have the right to claim that their order is superior to any and every other order. It is fatal, 'therefore, to complainant's case, if the difference of names indicates that defendants' society is a different society (even though it is claimed to be better) from complainant's. The law does not protect the name from any consideration for the feelings of those who bear it. Day v. Brownrigg, L. R. 10 Ch. Div. 294. The sole question is, as already stated, the effect, or probable effect, of the similarity of names, in diverting business. In determining this question, courts do not receive much, if any, aid from adjudicated cases. In the communications of defendants set up in complainant's bill the name of their society appears as follows: 'Improved Order, K. of P.' The name of the complainant is set forth as follows: 'Supreme Lodge Knights of Pythias.' It is the head of the 'Order Knights of Pythias.' To me it is self-evident that no careful person could think that these two orders were identical, and, as has been said, in cases of this class the question is whether the similarity is calculated to mislead the ordinary run of mankind. There certainly is just as much distinction between these names as there is between that of the Episcopal Church and the Reformed Episcopal Church, or that of the Presbyterian Church and the United Presbyterian Church. But we are referred to the case of Russia Cement Co. v. Le Page, 147 Mass. 206, holding that the introduction of the word 'improved' into the name of the article manufactured by defendant will not justify its use if, in other respects, its use is unjustifiable. Another case very similar is that of Hohner v. Gratz, 52 Fed. Rep. 871. In the former case it was held an invasion of the rights of the owner of the name 'Le Page's Liquid Glue' to use the name 'Le Page's Improved Liquid Glue.' In the latter case it was held an invasion of the rights of Mr. Hohner, who made and sold harmonicas under his own name, to use the name on harmonicas, 'Improved Hohner.' The distinction between these cases and the case at bar is obvious. In those cases the word 'improved' indicated, not a different glue, but an improved quality of the same glue. One wishing to buy 'Le Page's Liquid Glue' would naturally wish to buy 'Le Page's Improved Liquid Glue.' In the Hohner Case the court said 'The words "Improved Hohner" would signify his (Hohner's) make of a better quality,' and upon this ground an injunction was granted. Now, the name 'Improved Order, Knights of Pythias' does not mean, and no one can think for a moment that it does mean, that it is the same order as the Knights of Pythias. Everyone who knows enough about secret societies to be qualified to join them knows that a different name of a society means a different society. He would know that the Improved Order, Knights of Pythias was not a variety of the Order Knights of Pythias. The difference of names would indicate to him possibly a claim on the part of defendants that theirs was the better order, of which he must for himself determine; but certainly that it was a different order. If, in the Le Page or Hohner Case, the names had only indicated that a different article was claimed to be superior to one of similar name it is obvious that the court would not have interfered. 'Improved' has a different signification when prefixed to the name of an order from what it has when prefixed to the name of an article.

"The case of St. George Lodge, K. of P. v. Rosenthal, decided by Judge Foster, of the superior court of Vanderburgh county, Indiana, is more nearly in point. This case was brought by a subordinate lodge Knights of Pythias against some of the defendants in this suit, and the same relief was sought that is sought in this suit. That case arose upon demurrer to a complaint. Judge Foster, though sustaining the demurrer on the ground that the cause of action must be enforced by the Order Knights of Pythias, in that complaint stated to be a corporation, indicated his opinion, as candidly stated by him, on each question presented. He stated it to be his opinion that the assumption of the name 'Improved Order, Knights of Pythias,' under the circumstances alleged in the complaint, was wrongful. I have no criticism to make on this conclusion, nor, with the exception hereafter presented, on the reasoning upon which it is based. The facts alleged in that complaint and the facts established in this case differ radically. It was alleged in that case that defendants, in organizing and naming their society, were seeking to disrupt and defeat the Knights of Pythias. It did not appear, as, in my opinion, it does in this case, that the name 'Knights of Pythias' was in any way descriptive of the new organization. This circumstance is expressly alluded to in the reasoning by which Judge Foster reaches the conclusion that the assumption of the name is wrongful. I must conclude, therefore, that Judge Foster's opinion has no application to the facts established in this case. In speaking of the difference between the name of complainant and defendants' society, Judge Foster said, 'It is established by authorities too numerous to need citation that such a differentiation amounts to nothing.' This is the only statement in Judge Foster's opinion in which I cannot concur. I have already indicated my opinion concerning this difference, and the only cases which it is claimed hold that this differentiation amounts to nothing which I have been able to find, or which eminent counsel brought to my attention, are the cases which I have just tried to show are not in point. The best possible evidence that names are sufficiently similar to mislead the public is the fact that the public, or some portion thereof, has been misled. The defendant order was in existence more than a year before the testimony in this case was taken, and yet not a particle of evidence was introduced showing or tending to show that the similarity of names ever misled or deceived anyone. This case must be decided, not by citation of authorities, but by answering the question: Would an ordinary person, using ordinary care, wishing to join the Knights of Pythias, join the Improved Order, Knights of Pythias? For the reasons above stated, I must answer this question, No.

Henry HOFFMAN, Relator,

JUDGE OF THE CIRCUIT COURT FOR BAY COUNTY.

(.....Mich.....)

1. The privilege of exemption of attorneys from arrest in certain cases, given by How. Ann. Stat. § 7253, is not exclusive of the common-law privilege from service of process while attending court or returning therefrom.

2. An attorney at law is privileged from the service of process while attending upon the supreme court and while going to and returning from the court to the county of his residence.

(May 25, 1897.)

APPLICATION by relator for a writ of mandamus to compel defendant to dismiss a proceeding against relator which had been instituted out of his home jurisdiction while he was returning from court. Granted.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Mr. Charles R. Brown for relator.

Mr. C. L. Collins, for respondent:

At the common law the privilege of an attorney from arrest was an incident to a privilege he had in the manner by which he might be proceeded against in court. He had the privilege of being sued by a "bill of privilege," and that was the only method by which he could be sued.

It followed that he could not be arrested on a civil warrant, which was not allowed in proceeding by that method.

An attorney could not take the benefit of this privilege to be proceeded against by bill when sued with a codefendant not privileged.

An attorney appearing by another lost this privilege.

Harrington v. Page, 2 Dowl. P. C. 164; Dowless v. Timms, 3 Dowl. P. C. 707.

When an attorney was a defendant he had no privilege with respect to the venue whatever.

Yeardley v. Roe, 3 T. R. 573; Tope v. Redfearne, 4 Burr. 2027.

NOTE.—As to exemption of persons from process while going to, attending, or returning from court, see also Mulhern v. Press Pub. Co. (N. J. L.) 11 L. R. A. 101; Parker v. Maroo (N. Y.) 20 L. R. A. 45; Wilson v. Donaldson (Ind.) 3 L. R. A. 296, and note.

The practice under the bill of privilege, and its attendant privileges to lawyers, became obsolete in New York on or prior to the adoption of the Revised Statutes of 1828, and it is a fair inference that the statutes produced the result.

While an attorney is engaged in the trial of a cause, and in attendance upon the court for that purpose, and while going to and returning from the trial, he is exempt from arrest on civil process. And since arrest on civil process is now almost universally abolished in this country, this privilege is of slight importance.

3 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law, 2d ed. pp. 293, 294.

The Michigan statutes do not extend to other proceedings than the trial or hearings of pending causes.

Case v. Rorabacher, 15 Mich. 537; People, Watson, v. Detroit Super. Ct. Judge, 40 Mich. 729; Mitchell v. Huron Circuit Judge, 53 Mich. 541.

Montgomery, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

Relator is an attorney at law, and at the October term of this court appeared and argued a cause in this court, and, while on his return to his home at St. Ignace, was served with a summons at the suit of John Godkin, a party to the case pending in this court. He moved to dismiss the proceeding on the ground that he was privileged from the service of process while attending upon the court, and while going to and returning from the court to the county of his residence. The circuit judge denied the motion, and the question is before us for review on mandamus.

The only statute of this state bearing upon the subject is § 7253, How. Ann Stat., which reads: "All officers of the several courts of record shall be liable to arrest, and may be held to bail in the same manner as other persons, except during the actual sitting of any court of which they are officers; and when sued with any other person, such officers shall be liable to arrest, and may be held to bail as any other persons, during the sittings of the court of which they are officers; but no attorney, solicitor, or counselor shall be exempt from arrest during the sitting of the court of which he is an officer, unless he shall be employed in some cause pending and then to be heard in such court." It is said by respondent's counsel that this statute should be held to exclude all other privileges, and that this only relates to arrest on civil process, and does not apply to the service of summons. We think the statute should not be so construed, but that if, at the common law, the attorney was privileged from the service of process while attending upon court, that privilege has not been removed by the statute in question.

In Taylor Ev. p. 1126, the common law rule is stated: "In order to encourage witnesses to come forward voluntarily, they are not only protected from any action for defamation with respect to such statements as they may make in the course of the judicial proceeding, but in common with parties, barristers, solicitors, and, in short, all persons who have that relation to a suit which calls for their attendance, they are protected from arrest upon any civil process, while going to the place of trial, while attending there for the purposes of the cause, and while returning home." In the case of Mitchell v. Huron Circuit Judge, 53 Mich. 541, it was held by this court that as to parties the privilege extends to the service of summons, as well as to suit commenced by arrest. It was said that "public policy, the due administration of justice, and protection to parties and witnesses alike demand it." In Cofrode v. Gartner, 79 Mich., at page 349, 7 L. R. A. 511, Mr. Justice Campbell, referring to Jacobson v. Hosmer, 76 Mich. 284, said: "It has been settled that service cannot be made within the original county on anyone who is there as a witness, or on any other legal errand, which exempts him from process while away from his residence." In Mattheus v. Tufts, 87 N. Y. 568, the defendant attended a meeting of creditors of a bankrupt, for the purpose of proving claim in his own behalf and in behalf of others whom he represented. The court, after reviewing the authorities, says: "The plaintiff claims that the defendant was not attending as a witness, but only as a creditor. . . . Conceding that the defendant was in attendance only as a party, and as attorney of other parties, we think he was privileged from service of process or summons while so attending." It was further said: "This immunity does not depend upon statutory provisions, but is deemed necessary to the due administration of justice." In Central Trust Co. v. Milwaukee Street R. Co. 74 Fed. Rep. 442, a subpoena was served upon a nonresident attorney while attending upon the court in another county. Upon a review of the authorities, the court held that this was a violation of privilege. In Sherman v. Gundlach, 37 Minn. 118, it was said: "The same reasons for exempting a nonresident witness from arrest exist in favor of exempting him from the service of a summons in a civil action." In Massey v. Colville, 45 N. J. L. 119, 46 Am. Rep. 754, it was said: "The foundation of the rule is the impolicy of permitting an act which will deter suitors or witnesses from attending courts." This consideration applies with equal force to an attorney. See also Gilbert v. Vanderpool, 15 Johns. 242; Van Alstyne v. Dearborn, 2 Wend. 536; Hurst's Case, 4 U. Defects in the railing of a platform connected with a grain elevator do not render the owner of the premises liable to a person who was injured by the fall of the railing while he was leaning against it, thus putting it to a use for which it was not intended.

ERROR to the Circuit Court for Lenawee County to review a judgment in favor of plaintiff in an action to recover damages for injuries alleged to have been caused by the defective condition of defendant's premises.
Reversed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. Salsbury & O'Mealey for plaintiff in error.

Messrs. Watts, Bean, & Smith, for defendant in error:

Defendant was under obligation not to create or knowingly permit such a snare or trap, as the one in question, to be upon any part of the premises appropriated by him for the use of persons having occasion to come upon them to do business with him.

Cooley, Torts, p. 605; Breeze v. Powers, 80 Mich. 177; Emery v. Minneapolis Industrial Exposition, 56 Minn. 460.

The owner of lands is liable in damages to those coming thereon, using due care, at his invitation or inducement, express or implied, on any business to be transacted with or permitted by him, for an injury occasioned by the unsafe condition of the premises, which is known to him and not to them, and which he has suffered negligently to exist, and of which they have received no notice.

Donaldson v. Wilson, 60 Mich. 90.

Montgomery, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

This action was instituted by George B. Daniels in his lifetime, to recover damages sustained by reason of the alleged defective condition of the defendant's premises. The material facts in the case, as disclosed by the evidence, are that the defendant was the proprietor of a grain elevator, which consisted of a building 22 feet wide and 40 feet in length. On the south side of this building there is a bridge 12 feet in width, with an approach leading up to it at either end, of the same width. A pair of rolling doors, 7½ feet wide, open from about the center of the building onto this bridge or elevated platform. One means of approach to the office, which is in the elevated building, is to follow the driveway up to the platform, and across it, through these doors. Near the edge of this platform is a railing fastened to posts spiked to the sills of the bridge or platform. The posts are 4 by 4, with 2 by 6 pieces spiked lengthways on top. The railing is 8 feet high. In front of the rolling doors a space of 10 feet wide is left, where there is no railing, having been left out to facilitate the loading of heavy articles into farmers' wagons. The portion of the railing east of this opening is 20 feet long before the grade portion of the bridge is reached. On the west of the opening there is a railing 10 feet long, on the level part of the bridge, and another railing on the west grade, 8 feet in length. Farmers, in delivering grain to the elevator, drove onto the bridge, and, by means of a spout attached to the wagon, ran the grain into the hopper. The testimony tends to show that, a few days prior to the injury to the plaintiff, there had been a runaway, and the railing had been damaged, the top piece being torn off from the posts, and the posts also weakened; that the railing had been straightened up in such manner that its appearance did not indicate its weakness to the casual observer. The plaintiff, on the day in question, started to go to the elevator to buy a load of corn of the defendant. He went onto the bridge from the west part, well to the south side of the railing, and was passing in a northeasterly direction, to go through the rolling doors into the elevator building. If he had kept on in that direction, it would have brought him on the inside of the elevator, where his business with the proprietor was to be transacted; but it appears that at this time his son, Willis Daniels, and William Knapp were on the bridge unloading a load of wheat, and his son called to him, saying that he had some money for him. At that plaintiff turned southeast, came up to the south side of the wagon, near the center, a distance of 15 or 16 feet, where his son was, and got the money. After he got it, he was talking with these two men a few minutes about the horses, and, while so talking leaned against the railing and it gave way, and he fell to the ground, and was injured. Upon this state of facts the plaintiff recovered, and the defendant brings error, and contends that there is no case shown by the plaintiff's testimony entitling him to recover, and that the defendant was under no obligation to build a railing, or keep it in repair, for the plaintiff to lounge or sit upon or lean against. The plaintiff, on the other hand, contends that the case falls within the rule that where a party, expressly or by implication, invites others to come upon his premises, whether for business or any other purpose, it is his duty to be reasonably sure that he is not inviting them into danger, and, to that end, he must exercise ordinary care and prudence to render the premises reasonably safe for the visit.

This case is certainly near the dividing line. The rule is well settled that the owner or occupant of land is liable to those coming to it at his invitation, express or implied, on any business to be transacted or permitted by him, for an injury occasioned by the unsafe condition of the land or the access to it, which is known to him, and not to them, and which he has negligently suffered to exist. But this duty, it is held, does not extend so far as to make such an occupant responsible for the unsafe condition of those parts of his premises not intended for the reception of visitors or customers, and where they are not expected to go. See 1 Thomp. Neg. p. 808. Applying these rules to this case, it is clear that, if the plaintiff had suffered an injury from a defect in the floor-way of the platform or bridge, or, possibly, if, by misadventure, he had stumbled and fallen against this defective railing, there would be ground for holding that the defendant is responsible for the injury. But the weakness of the plaintiff's case is that the defendant never invited him to enter upon his premises, and put the railing to the test of supporting his weight, by leaning or lounging against it. The only cases in which a similar question has arisen, which have been called to our attention, are those of Stickney v. Salem, 8 Allen, 874, and Orcutt v. Kittery Point Bridge Co. 53 Me. 500. In Stickney v. Salem the action was against the city for injuries resulting to deceased caused by leaning against a fence or railing which marked the terminus of the street, and was built upon the top of a sea wall. The plaintiff, in company with a friend, had walked to this point to view the sea, had turned his back to and leaned against this railing, which gave way, because of defects, and he received serious injuries. The court says: "The fact that the railing was defective and would have proved an insufficient barrier in case it became necessary for a traveler to use it for a legitimate object is wholly immaterial. It is a sufficient answer to the plaintiff's case that the defendants were not bound to keep the railing in repair for the purpose for which it was used by the deceased at the time of the accident." The case of Orcutt v. Kittery Point Bridge Co. is precisely analogous to that of Stickney v. Salem.

It is urged by plaintiff's counsel that a distinction exists between private premises and a public highway in this regard, and that the rule of the care required of the highway authorities is based upon a different principle from that of private parties inviting persons upon their premises. We think, however, that this distinction cannot avail the plaintiff in this case. The invitation to the plaintiff was to do business in the elevator. The approach to the place of business was an elevated private way. It could not be expected any more by this defendant than by the city authorities of Salem in the case cited that this private way would be put to any other than the uses to which it was apparently adapted. Undoubtedly, in the case of a municipality or an individual maintaining a way, an injury resulting from a defect in the way itself, to one who stops to transact business, may be recovered for. But the weakness of the plaintiff's case arises from the fact that this railing was put to a use for which it was not intended, any more, in the present case, than were the railings in cases cited from Massachusetts and Maine. Plaintiff's counsel concede that the defendant was under no obligation to build or keep the railing in repair for plaintiff to lounge or sit upon or lean against, but they contend that the defendant's liability arises out of his knowingly permitting a snare or trap, by leaving the railing in good apparent order, but in fact so defective that one was liable to receive injury from it. But, before it could become a snare or trap, it must be assumed that its apparent good condition was an invitation to make such a use of it as the plaintiff attempted. As we have seen, its presence was not an invitation to make that use of it.

We think there was no case for the jury, and that the judgment should be reversed, and no new trial ordered.

The other Justices concurred.

CHICAGO & GRAND TRUNK RAILWAY COMPANY, Pf. in Err.

(.....Mich.....)

Authority of a brakeman on a freight train to eject a passenger cannot be implied, so as to render the employer liable for his acts in this respect, from rules of the company providing that such trains shall not carry passengers, and also that the brakemen must familiarize themselves with the rules, but also providing that brakemen are subject at all times to the orders of the conductors.

ERROR to the Circuit Court for Eaton County to review a judgment in favor of plaintiff in an action brought to recover damages for personal injuries alleged to have been caused by defendant's negligence. Reversed. The facts are stated in the opinion.

Mr. E. W. Meddaugh, with Messrs. Geer & Williams, for plaintiff in error:

If a passenger to whom the railroad company owes a duty jump off a fast moving train, the company is not liable.

Lake Shore & M. S. R. Co. v. Bangs, 47 Mich. 470; Burden v. Lake Shore & M. S. R. Co. 104 Mich. 101.

At the time plaintiff was injured he was riding on defendant's freight train in violation of the statute which forbids stealing a ride on a freight train, and was riding without the permission of defendant.

Plaintiff at the time he was injured, was not in a position where the defendant owed him any duty except not to do him any wanton or wilful injury.

2 Wood, Railroads, Minor's ed. § 816.

It became necessary that plaintiff should prove, in order to entitle him to recover, not only that he was injured because of the wrongful act of the brakeman, but also that the brakeman was acting within the scope of his employment and line of his duty in causing him to get off the freight train.

Long, Ch. J., delivered the opinion of the court:

This action was brought to recover damages for injuries claimed to have been sustained by plaintiff by being compelled by a brakeman to jump from a freight train, while in motion, belonging to defendant. The injury occurred March 19, 1894. The plaintiff, without permission of the defendant, got upon one of defendant's freight trains at Charlotte, this state. When the train arrived near Olivet Hill, plaintiff was discovered by one of defendant's brakemen between two cars, holding onto the projecting iron at the end of the car. Plaintiff claims that, while the train was running at a high rate of speed, he saw the brakeman, and climbed around upon the side of the car, taking hold of the ladder which is used to climb on the car. The brakeman then commenced pouring black oil upon him, and said, "Are you going to get off from here?" That his hands got so slippery from the oil that he could not hold on longer, when he jumped off and was severely injured. On the trial the court instructed the jury: "If you believe from the evidence that the brakeman of the defendant's train commenced pouring oil upon him until his hands became so slippery from the oil that he could not hold on longer with safety, and that it was safer for him to jump than it would be to remain hanging to the train, and he did jump and was injured thereby, your verdict must be for the plaintiff." There were verdict and judgment for plaintiff. It appeared upon the trial that this was a through freight train, not authorized to carry passengers without special permit from the officers of the company. The company had printed rules. Certain of those rules were printed upon cards and hung in the way stations. Upon one in the station at Charlotte the following rule was printed: "Passengers will not be carried under any circumstances upon any freight train, except such as are designated, and between points named upon the time table; nor will they be carried upon such freight trains unless provided with freight-train permits." This was not one of the trains named upon the time-table, and the plaintiff had no permit to ride thereon. He was a trespasser in getting upon the train. He had no right there. By rule 172 of the company it is provided, "Brakemen are under the orders of the conductor;" and by rule 170 it is also provided, "Brakemen must make themselves thoroughly acquainted with the whole code of signals, and the instructions referred to in these rules, as well as those embodied in the said time tables." At the close of the testimony, counsel for defendant requested the court to charge the jury that their verdict must be for the defendant. This was refused and the question was submitted to the jury for their determination as one of fact.

Counsel for plaintiff contends that the record shows that the brakeman had the authority to remove the plaintiff from the train, and having exercised that authority in a cruel and unjustifiable manner, by means of which the plaintiff was injured, a right of action exists against the defendant company. This contention is based upon the rules of the company, which were out in evidence. The claim is made that inasmuch as the rules provided that this class of trains should not carry passengers, and that the brakemen of the defendant company were required to familiarize themselves with those rules, the brakeman must have known that it was his duty, and that he was authorized by the company to eject the plaintiff from this train, and that in ejecting him he was in the discharge of a duty which the company had imposed upon him. On the other hand, it is contended by counsel for defendant that, under rule 172, brakemen of freight trains are subject at all times to the orders of the conductors of the trains; that the rules nowhere imply that a brakeman has authority to eject, or that the company has placed upon the brakeman the duty of ejecting, even trespassers from freight trains, but that they are subject to the orders of the conductors of such trains; and that in the present case the brakeman is not shown to have received any such orders, and that, therefore, his act in ejecting the plaintiff was not the act of the defendant company; that it became necessary, in order to entitle plaintiff to recover, that he should prove, not only that he was injured because of the wrongful act of the brakeman, but also that the brakeman was acting within the scope of his employment, and in the line of his duty, in causing plaintiff to jump off. In other words, that he must show that the brakeman inflicting the injury possessed the authority to do the act which resulted in the injury. It is conceded that there is no proof in that regard, unless the rules of the company are to be construed as contended by counsel for plaintiff. We think the rules cannot be so construed. It is true that passengers are not permitted to ride upon this class of freight trains, and that brakemen are required to familiarize themselves with these rules, but under rule 172 the brakemen must take their orders from the conductor. There is consequently no proof in the case that the brakeman here had authority from the company to do the act complained of. The burden was upon the plaintiff to show such authority. In Corcoran v. Concord & M. R. Co. 5 U. S. App. 458, 6 C. A. 231, 56 Fed. Rep. 1015, it appeared that plaintiff was riding upon the top of the freight car without having paid his fare; that he was ordered off by a person whom he assumed to be a brakeman; that the brakeman seized him and threw him off while the train was in rapid motion, whereby he was injured. The court directed a verdict in favor of defendant, and the court of appeals affirmed the ruling, saying: "The court is of the opinion that the plaintiff should have offered some evidence showing the scope of the alleged brakeman's authority. He failed to do so, and for that reason it is ordered that the judgment be affirmed." In Pennsylvania Co. v. Dean, 98 Ind. 459, it was said: "But if the appellee was on the train without right, being a mere trespasser, the fact that the injury was occasioned by the negligent or unlawful acts of the appellant's employees would not make the appellant liable unless it further appeared that the acts complained of occurred within the scope of the servant's employment." In Towanda Coal Co. v. Heeman, 86 Pa. 418, the plaintiff, a small boy, climbed upon the cars of defendant after the train had started. He was seen by one of the brakemen, who threw some pieces of coal, which struck the boy in the face, in consequence of which he slipped and fell in trying to get off the car. There was no evidence given of the authority of the brakeman to eject the trespasser from the train, and the defendant asked an instruction that a verdict be rendered in its favor on this ground. This the court refused, but submitted the question to the jury to determine whether the brakeman was acting within the scope of his employment. The case was appealed, and it was said by the appellate court: "A careful examination of all the testimony has shown that not a word contained in it tended to prove that the brakeman whose conduct is complained of, in the cruel and wanton assault he made on the plaintiff, was acting in pursuance of an authority conferred on him. The only affirmative proof was precisely in the opposite direction. . . . Upon the facts developed on the trial, although the plaintiff had no right to be on the cars, the jury would have been justified in finding, as they did, such reckless, gross, and culpable negligence as to render the defendant liable for damages, if the brakeman had been shown to have been acting in the line of his duty and within the scope of his employment. With no evidence that he was so acting, and with the testimony of the assistant superintendent to the contrary, it was a mistake to submit the question whether the wrongful act was or was not done in the exercise of a duly delegated authority." The following cases sustain this rule: International & G. N.

R. Co. v. Anderson, 86 Tex. 516; Texas & P. R. Co. v. Moody (Tex. Civ. App.) 23 S. W. 41; Bess v. Chesapeake & O. R. Co. 95 W. Va. 492; Lake Shore & M. S. R. Co. v. Peterson, 144 Ind. 214; Farber v. Missouri P. R. Co. 116 Mo. 81, 20 L. R. A. 350. Under the rules laid down in these cases, the defendant was entitled to have its request given that a verdict be rendered in its favor.

The judgment must be reversed.

No new trial will be ordered.

Grant and Moore, JJ., concurred with Long, Ch. J.

Montgomery, J., dissenting:

There is a conflict in the authorities upon the question presented in this case, namely, whether a brakeman on a freight train has implied authority to eject a trespasser. On principle, I am of opinion that such authority is to be implied from the nature of his employment. In the present case it was shown that the rules of the company prohibited the carrying of passengers upon the train in question, and it was shown that it was by another rule provided that it was the duty of the brakemen of the company to familiarize themselves with all its rules. In Patterson, Railway Accident Law, § 111, it is said to be the doctrine of most of the cases that when a railway servant is put in charge of any of the property of the railway, as a station master in charge of a station, or a conductor in charge of a train, or an engine driver or fireman in charge of an engine, or a brakeman in charge of a car, that servant is necessarily charged with the duty of protecting that particular property, and he is therefore, for that purpose, vested with an implied authority to remove trespassers therefrom. This doctrine is approved in Brevig v. Chicago, St. P. M. & O. R. Co. 64 Minn. 163, where it is said that the "duties [of a freight-train brakeman] do not consist merely of turning the brakes. By universal custom he has police duties as to the cars immediately under his charge." It was said in Hoffman v. New York C. & H. R. R. Co. 87 N. Y. 25, 41 Am. Rep. 337, speaking of the brakeman: "His duties do not primarily pertain to the protection of the cars against intruders; but he is a servant of the company on the train concerned in its management, and fully cognizant of the obvious fact that intruders, who jump upon the trains for a ride, without intention of becoming passengers, are wrongfully there." See also St. Louis, A. & T. H. R. Co. v. Reagan, 52 Ill. App. 488; Vertrees v. Newport & M. V. R. Co. 95 Ky. 314; Houston, C. A. & N. R. Co. v. Dolling, 50 Ark. 395, 27 L. R. A. 190; Chicago, K. & N. R. Co. v. Parkinson, 56 Kan. 655; Smith v. Louisville & N. R. Co. 95 Ky. 11, 22 L. R. A. 72.

A distinction was attempted to be drawn on the argument between a freight train and a passenger train, favorable to the defendant's contention. In my opinion, the authority of the freight brakeman is quite as clear as would be that of a passenger brakeman. It may be said with some force that, before the brakeman would have implied authority to eject an apparent trespasser from a passenger train, the conductor should be consulted, for the reason that it is the conductor who is to determine who are authorized to ride upon the train, while in the case of a freight train not carrying passengers it is at once apparent to the brakeman that a stranger boarding the train is a trespasser.

2. The will further provides: "The rest, residue, and remainder . . . I give and bequeath to the Central Park Methodist Episcopal Church of St. Paul, Minnesota, absolutely, to be used by said church in aiding the cause of home and foreign missions equally." The church was incorporated, and was authorized by statute to acquire property by gift for mission purposes, and to accept any gift in trust for the purposes for which given. Held, the devise is an absolute gift to the church, and not a devise in trust, and is valid.

CROSS-APPEALS from orders of the District Court for Ramsey County denying motions for new trial after a judgment construing the will of George Eaton, deceased; the defendants questioning the correctness of the ruling which upheld certain devises; and the plaintiffs questioning so much as declared certain devises void. Affirmed on defendants' motion. Reversed on plaintiffs' motion.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. Ambrose Tighe and F. G. B. Woodruff, for defendants heirs of George Eaton:

The test as to whether an equitable conversion is had is not to be found by inquiring whether the executors may sell, but whether they must.

Haward v. Pearey, 128 Ill. 430.

Property left by a testator will be taken by the courts to be of that character in which the testator intended it should be finally and ultimately fixed and reposed.

Neither the St. Paul branch of the Salvation Army nor the cause of "home and foreign missions" is an entity which can hold real property, in its own name, or be made the beneficiary of a trust of real property, and therefore the bequest to the plaintiffs in trust for the Salvation Army is void, as is also the bequest to the church for the cause of "home and foreign missions."

A religious society is a voluntary association of individuals or families united for the purpose of having a common place of worship and to provide a proper teacher to instruct them in religious doctrines and duties, and to administer the ordinances of religion (baptism, etc.).

There is nothing which even hints that the maintenance of home and foreign missions is a part of the regular business of religious corporations in general, and nothing which will 88 L. R. A.

justify the court in assuming, as a matter of law, in the absence of evidence, that such work is a part of the regular business of the Central Park Methodist Episcopal Church.

An outside entity, like the Missionary Society in New York, using its own judgment and employing its own machinery, is not an agent of the church in the cause of home and foreign missions, but rather the beneficiary of its bounty.

Messrs. H. J. Horn and A. E. Horn for plaintiffs.

Canty, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

This action was brought by the executors for the construction of the will of George Eaton, deceased.

1. The will contains the following provision: "I give, devise, and bequeath one other equal share or third part, to be first selected and set apart by my executors or the survivor of them, to John W. Lane and John C. Quinby, or the survivor of them, in trust, to keep the same carefully invested, and to receive the rents, profits, and income thereof, and to pay and apply the same, together with the principal sum, or third part, to and for the use of the branch of the Salvation Army, so called, located in the said city of St. Paul; said principal and interest accruing thereon to be permanently invested in the purchase of a lot and the erection thereon of a place of worship where said Salvation Army may hold its meetings; said share or third part and the interest thereon never to be used or invested outside of said city, but is given solely for the purpose heretofore mentioned. If said branch of the Salvation Army in said city is or should become legally organized so it may take and hold the title to property, then I direct the said trustees, or the survivor of them, to transfer said third part or share, and all the rents, income, and profit of the same, together with any other property which may come to them under any of the provisions of this will, to said organization as soon after the settlement of my estate as practicable." On the trial it appeared from the evidence that the Salvation Army is an unincorporated religious society having its headquarters in London, England. The officers of the organization have military titles. The head officer in England is called "general;"

the subordinate officer who is head of the organization in the United States is called "commander;" a "major" has charge of a division of the country, and a "captain," of a local post or "barracks." While these officers have military titles, they perform duties similar to those of the officers in other religious denominations. Thus a commander corresponds to a bishop, a major to a presiding elder, and a captain to a minister or pastor. The barracks is the church. The property of the society in a country is held in the name of the commander in that country, and he is appointed by the general in England. The government of the society seems to be very much centralized, but not more so, perhaps, than in the case of some other religious societies or sects. The court below held this devise void. Nearly all of the testator's property consisted of land, and as, by the terms of the will, the part of this land so devised was to be sold, and the proceeds reinvested in other land, the bequest, notwithstanding this double conversion, continued to be real estate. 8 Pom. Eq. Jur. § 1178. Then the bequest is void, unless valid as a bequest of real estate. Section 4274, chap. 43, Gen. Stat. 1894, provides that uses and trusts are abolished, except as authorized by that chapter. It is well settled in the states from which we derived this statute that it has abolished the great body of the English law of charitable uses and trusts and the doctrine of cy pres as administered in England. See 2 Pom. Eq. Jur. §§ 1018-1029. Under this statute the beneficiary of the trust must be certain, or capable of being rendered certain. Therefore no unincorporated, voluntary association, whose membership is fluctuating and uncertain, can be the cestui que trust. Downing v. Marshall, 23 N. Y. 368, 80 Am. Dec. 290; First Society of M. E. Church v. Clark, 41 Mich. 730; Ruth v. Oberbrunner, 40 Wis. 238. See also 2 Pom. Eq. Jur. § 1029, and cases cited in Holland v. Alcock, 108 N. Y. 312. See also German Land Assn. v. Scholler, 10 Minn. 331 (Gil. 260). But there is another statute which is in pari materia with chap. 43, and which must be construed with it in disposing of the question here presented. Title 4, chap. 84, Gen. Stat. 1894, provides for organizing unincorporated churches into corporations. Section 3022 of this title provides: "It shall be lawful for all persons of full age, belonging to any church, congregation or religious society, not already incorporated, to assemble at the church or meeting-house, or other place where they statedly attend for divine worship, and, by a plurality vote, elect any number of discreet persons of their church, congregation, or society, not less than three nor more than nine in number, as trustees to take charge of the estate and property belonging thereto, and transact all affairs relative to the temporalities thereof." The next four sections provide the manner of giving notice of the time and place of election, the manner of conducting the election, and the manner of executing and recording the certificate of election, which, when executed and recorded, shall incorporate the congregation or society. Section 3027 then provides: "Such trustees may have a common seal, and alter the same at pleasure; they may take into their possession and custody all the temporalities of such church, congregation, or society, whether the same consists of real or personal estate, and have been given, granted, or devised directly or indirectly to such church, congregation, or society, or to any other person for their use." Section 3048 further provides: "Whenever any church or religious society now organized, or which may hereafter be organized, as a church or congregation, but not incorporated in pursuance of law, shall comply with the provisions of this title, and thereby become a body corporate, all the estate, real and personal, which has been lawfully conveyed to the said church or religious society, or to the trustees or vestry thereof in trust for the use of such church or society, whether by devise, gift, grant, purchase, or otherwise, and not lawfully disposed of, shall thereupon vest in said corporation as fully and amply as if the said church had been legally incorporated from the date of its religious organization; provided, that the name or title publicly assumed or borne by such church or society from the date of its organization as such, and none other, shall be the title by which it shall forever be known in law and as a body politic and corporate." If the St. Paul branch of the Salvation Army sees fit to and does incorporate within a reasonable time, why will these sections not apply so as to vest the devise aforesaid in the corporation? We see no reason why. It was so held under a statute similar in its provisions to § 3037 aforesaid. See Reformed Prot. Dutch Church v. Veeder, 4 Wend. 494, and First Society of M. E. Church v. Clark, 41 Mich. 730. We are of the opinion that the devise is void only on condition that the said branch of the Salvation Army fails to incorporate within a reasonable time, which, however, will not extend beyond the time of the hearing of the application for the decree of distribution. It therefore follows that the court below erred in declaring the devise absolutely void. In arriving at this result, we have not overlooked § 3040, which reads as follows: "All lands, tenements, and hereditaments, lawfully conveyed by devise, grant, purchase, or otherwise, to any persons as trustees, in trust for the use of any religious society organized, or which may hereafter be organized within this state, either for a meeting-house, burying ground, or for the residence of a preacher, shall descend with the improvements in perpetual succession to, and shall be held by, such trustees in trust for such society." We agree with the learned judge of the court below that the trustees here referred to are the trustees of the church itself, and not other persons selected by the testator as trustees of the property devised or bequeathed by him. We are also of the opinion that one of the purposes of this section was to abrogate the rule against perpetuities and the rule which prohibits restraint of alienation, so far as these rules might apply to property conveyed, devised, or bequeathed for any of the three purposes therein specified, to wit, "for a meeting-house, burying-ground, or for the residence of a preacher," and that when so vested in the corporation for any of these purposes the property may be held in "perpetual succession." This obviates the ground on which the grant was held void in First Society of M. E. Church v. Clark, 41

Mich. 780, and is a sufficient answer to the claim of the defendant heirs that the devise is void because it contravenes the rule against perpetuities. Neither is the result at which we have arrived in conflict with Little v. Willford, 31 Minn. 173. In that case the conveyance was to certain named persons, "trustees of M. E. Church [of the County of Olmsted and state of Minnesota], . . . in trust that said premises shall be used, maintained, and disposed of as a place of divine worship for the use of the ministry and membership of the Methodist Episcopal Church in the United States [of America]." The conveyance was not to or for the benefit of any particular congregation or religious society, or any local subdivision of any religious society which could incorporate under the laws of this state, but was in trust for the use of the whole membership of a certain denomination in the United States. Whether or not the policy of the Salvation Army is such that it will permit the St. Paul branch to incorporate as a separate entity, and thereby receive this bequest, is a matter which neither the court nor anyone else but the Salvation Army itself can determine. Under the statute the opportunity must be given to it to do so if it sees fit.

2. After making various other bequests, the will provides: "All the rest, residue, and remainder . . . I give, devise, and bequeath to the Central Park Methodist Episcopal Church of St. Paul, Minnesota, absolutely, to be used by said church or its trustees in aiding the cause of home and foreign missions, equally." The church is duly incorporated. The court below held this devise valid. If this devise is an absolute gift to the church it is valid, but if it is a devise in trust it is not valid, as there is no ascertained beneficiary. We are of the opinion that it is an absolute gift to the church. Sections 2, 3, chap. 878, Special Laws 1887, provide as to this church as follows:

"Sec. 2. That the trustees of the society as aforesaid in addition to the authority and power already granted by the rules and regulations of said church and the statutes, are hereby further authorized to acquire by gift or purchase any real property in the city of Saint Paul necessary for mission purposes, and to sell the same when in their opinion it is for the best interest of said church.

"Sec. 3. That the said trustees aforesaid are further authorized to accept any gift, conveyance of real [estate] or other property, and to hold the same in trust for the purposes for which given, and to sell or convey the same from time to time, and to invest and dispose of the proceeds in accordance with the power and authority of the gift or trust."

A part of the general purposes for which this church is organized is missionary work, and funds given to it to be used in that work are not given in trust in the technical sense of that word. Thus, in Atwater v. Russell, 49 Minn. 57, 82, and 86, lands were conveyed with directions that the proceeds be used by a certain incorporated hospital "for the support of charity patients in the same." This kind of charity work was a part of the purposes for which the hospital was incorporated, and the gift was held to be absolute, and not in trust. See also 38 L. R. A.

Bird v. Merkle, 144 N. Y. 544, 37 L. R. A. 423; Domestic & Foreign Missionary Soc. of Protestant Episcopal Church v. Gaither, 62 Fed. Rep. 422.

This disposes of the case. The order denying defendant's motion for a new trial is affirmed, the order denying plaintiff's motion for a new trial is reversed, and the case is remanded to the court below, with directions to change its conclusions of law and order for judgment so that the same shall be in conformity with this opinion.

Buck, J., dissenting:

I dissent from that part of the foregoing opinion which holds that a branch of the Salvation Army might hereafter incorporate within a reasonable time, and that, if it did so, the attempted devise would vest in such corporation. A devise surrounded with such uncertainty and complexity ought not to be permitted to stand. What is a reasonable time will doubtless be another matter of litigation, and the decision rather encourages than ends litigation. That which was already uncertain is thus made more so,—a rule which should find no place in the construction of wills.

Mitchell, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The defendants in these actions were severally indicted for a refusal to turn over to a public warehouseman certain goods, which had not been called for by the consignee, pursuant to the provisions of § 11 of chapter 149, Gen. Laws 1895, entitled "An Act to License and Regulate the Business of Storage Companies and Public Warehousemen (Other Than Warehousemen of Grain in Bulk), and to Provide a Penalty for Violation of the Same." Section 1 of the act provides that "the governor may license any suitable person, persons, or corporations established under the laws of this state, and having their place or places of business within this state, to carry on the business of storage companies or public warehousemen, who may keep and maintain public warehouses for the storage of goods, wares, and merchandise, etc., excepting grain in bulk. Said license must be obtained within thirty days from and after the passage of this bill, upon the payment into the treasury of the state of the sum of $10, and annually thereafter, by the payment of a like sum, to be credited to the school fund of the state." Section 9 makes it unlawful for anyone not duly licensed under the provisions of the act to conduct or carry on the business of a storage company or warehouseman in this state. Section 10 makes a violation of the provisions of §§ 9 and 11 a misdemeanor punishable by fine. Section 11, under which the indictments were drawn, reads as follows: "Sec. 11. This act shall not be construed to apply to any railroad or transportation company who holds goods, wares, or merchandise in cars, freight houses, or warehouses for a period not exceeding twenty days after receipt. Provided, such railroad or transportation company shall, within forty-eight hours after the receipt of such goods, wares, and merchandise, notify the consignee of the arrival thereof in writing, and in case such consignee, or his assigns, fails and neglects to call for or receive said goods, wares, or merchandise within twenty days after such receipt of same by any railroad or transportation company as aforesaid, said railroad or transportation company must then turn over said goods, wares, or merchandise to a storage company or public warehouseman, licensed as in this act provided, upon the payment of the charges of said carrier thereon, which charges thus paid by said storage company or warehouseman to said carrier shall be a lien on said goods, wares, or merchandise, and enforceable in accordance with §§ 1, 2, 3, and 4, chapter 202 of the General [Laws] of 1885."

Among other objections to the sufficiency of these indictments, it is urged that the act in question is unconstitutional. The act is certainly a remarkable one. Its provisions contain strong intrinsic evidence that the real purpose of it was not the protection of the public by regulating public warehousemen or by adopting reasonable regulations for the preservation of unclaimed property in the hands of common carriers, but to subvert the interests of a certain class of warehousemen. We have no doubt that the public storage and warehouse business is one that is subject to the police power of the state to adopt such reasonable regulations as the legislature may deem necessary for the protection of the public who intrust their property to those carrying on such a business. We may also admit that it is within the police power of the state to adopt any reasonable regulations for the preservation and protection of property which has been transported to the place of its consignment by a common carrier, and is abandoned, or not claimed within a reasonable time by the consignee or owner. It is also true that, where a business is a proper subject of police regulation, the legislature may, in the exercise of that power, adopt any measures they see fit, provided, only, that they adopt such as have some relation to and have some tendency to accomplish the desired end; and if the measures adopted have such relation or tendency, and do not violate some provision of the Constitution, the courts will not assume to determine whether they are wise or the best thing that might have been adopted. But, while the police power of the state is a very extensive one, it is not without limits. A law enacted in the exercise of the police power must be a police regulation in fact. If it will not conduce to any legitimate police purpose, or if it amounts to an arbitrary and unwarranted interference with the right of the citizen to pursue any lawful business, the courts have a right, and it is their duty, to declare the law unconstitutional. The business of a common carrier and the storage and warehouse business are both lawful without any license or authority from the state. Everyone has a right to engage in them, subject only to such regulations and restrictions as are necessary to promote the general welfare. Neither of them is a business which the state has any right to prohibit altogether or to limit to a favored few by giving them a monopoly of it. Therefore the police power must, when exercised over them, be confined to such restrictions and burdens as are necessary to promote the public welfare, or, in other words, to prevent the infliction of a public injury.

If the 1st section of this act is to be construed literally as it reads, it would give a monopoly of the public storage and warehouse business to those to whom the governor granted licenses "within thirty days from and after the passage of the act." Under such a construction, the act would be clearly unconstitutional. Again, while the act requires every storage company or warehouseman to receive and store all property offered for such purposes by any person, without discrimination, it nowhere, at least in express terms, requires them to advance the charges of the carrier. If they may consent or decline, at their option, to advance these charges, the law would have no reasonable tendency to protect and preserve unclaimed property. It would permit the storage company or warehouseman to accept from the carrier only such business as he might deem to his own personal advantage, and reject the balance. Further, if the proviso to § 11 is to be construed as it seems to read, it would absolutely compel every common carrier in every instance to notify the consignee of the arrival of the goods within forty-eight hours, and, in case he did not call for or receive the goods within twenty days, to turn them over to a warehouseman, without regard to what agreement or arrangement to the contrary there might be between the carrier and the consignor or consignee, as, for example, that the goods should be shipped or held by the carrier for future delivery. If this is the proper construction of the act, it is clearly unconstitutional, as being an arbitrary and unwarranted interference with the right of parties to contract with reference to the disposition of their own property.

But we shall assume that the law might be cut down by judicial construction so as to obviate all these objections, and that we would be justified in holding that the storage and warehouse business is not limited to those who obtained license, within thirty days after the act was passed; that public warehousemen are required to advance the charges and receive all unclaimed property tendered them by a common carrier, regardless of the amount of the charges or the value of the property (a construction which we apprehend warehousemen would be loth to assent to); and that the only property which carriers are required to turn over to a warehouseman is property shipped for immediate delivery, and which remains unclaimed for twenty days, in the absence of any agreement between the carrier and consignee that the former should continue to hold it for the latter. There is still an objection to the law which is fatal to it. There are, and necessarily will be, many places in the state where there is no storage company or public warehouseman who has complied with the provisions of this act. We are justified in stating, by way of illustration, the fact that there are only three places in the state (St. Paul, Minneapolis, and Duluth) where anyone has complied with the provisions of this act and taken out a license. But under this law wherever the place of consignment may be, even if at the extreme northwestern or southwestern corner of the state, the carrier would be required to transport the goods, or procure them to be transported thence, to a place where there is a public warehouse, and then turn them over. Indeed, it would seem, from the language of the act, that it would be incumbent on the carrier to procure drays or wagons to transport the goods from the depot or landing to the warehouse, and there tender the property to the warehouseman. Such a law, so far from preserving unclaimed property for whom it may concern, would furnish a most effectual way to absorb it with unnecessary costs and charges. It would have no tendency to subserve any public interest, and would impose a most unreasonable burden upon carriers. On this ground we hold that, even if all the other provisions of the act are valid, the proviso in § 11, in so far as it requires common carriers to turn over property to a public warehouse, is unconstitutional.

The orders overruling the demurrers are therefore reversed, and the causes remanded, with directions to the court below to dismiss the indictments.

(.....Minn.....)

*1. Upon habeas corpus cognizance can be taken only of defects of a jurisdictional character, which render the proceedings under which the relator is imprisoned, not merely erroneous, but absolutely void.

2. Under the general grant of power to make all regulations and to ordain all ordinances which may be expedient or necessary for the preservation of health, the suppression of disease, and to prevent the introduction of contagious diseases, the common council of St. Paul had authority to pass an ordinance requiring those carrying on the business of scavenger, as therein defined, cleaning out and removing the contents of privy vaults, cess pools, sinks, and private drains, to first obtain a license, and requiring the licensee to obtain a permit from the commissioner of health before removing the contents of any privy vault, cess pool, etc.

(July 9, 1897.)

A PPEAL by relator from an order of the District Court for Ramsey County refusing to discharge him from custody to which he had been committed for violation of an ordinance prohibiting the doing of the work of a scavenger without a permit. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Mr. Walter L. Chapin, for appellant:

There is no authority in the St. Paul charter for licensing those engaged in the scavenger business.

The health commissioner has no authority or control (at other than in times of epidemic) except to enforce regulations for the health of the city previously prescribed by ordinance duly passed by the council. His duty is confined to putting into force rules so made and no others. The making of such regulations cannot be delegated by the council to any other person or body.

The power to license must be clearly given or it cannot be exercised, and where specific pursuits are specified as licensable, it is an implied denial of the power to require a license for other kinds of business.

St. Paul v. Traeger, 25 Minn. 248, 38 Am. Rep. 462; St. Paul v. Stoltz, 33 Minn. 233; Dill. Mun. Corp. § 361 (295).

If the power be in the council to compel scavengers to take out licenses, the ordinance in question specifies no general rules or conditions with which all may comply. It reserves to the council the power to issue or not issue licenses at its own caprice, to grant a monopoly, or to favor one person or another. It makes no provision for equal rights to all.

The provisions of the 14th Amendment to the United States Constitution guaranteeing equal protection of the laws has been held to require ordinances to provide uniform conditions of general application in regulating the pursuit of any occupation or right; otherwise such ordinance is void.

Ord. §§ 13, 263.

Messrs. James E. Markham, H. W. Phillips, and Carl Taylor for respondent.

Mitchell, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The charter grants to the common council the following powers, among others: "To do all acts and make all regulations which may be necessary or expedient for the preservation of health and the suppression of disease, and make regulations to prevent the introduction of contagious diseases into the city." St. Paul Mun. Code 1893, § 40, cl. 33. "The common council of the city of St. Paul, in addition to its other powers, is hereby authorized to ordain such other and further ordinances, not inconsistent with the laws of the state, which shall be deemed expedient for the good government of the city, the protection of its property, the preservation of peace and good order, the suppression of vice, the benefit of trade and commerce, the preservation of health, etc." Id. § 53. Under this grant of power, the common council passed ordinance No. 1835, found in Paper Book, pages 1 to 15, entitled "An Ordinance to Provide for the Licensing of Scavengers and the Removal of Night Soil." Having been convicted in the municipal court of St. Paul of violating § 4 of this ordinance, by removing the contents of a cess pool without having obtained a permit so to do from the commissioner of health, and upon such conviction sentenced for imprisonment for ten days in the St. Paul workhouse, of which the respondent is the keeper and custodian, the relator having alleged that his confinement was illegal, petitioned for, and was granted, a writ of habeas corpus to test the legality of his imprisonment.

The grounds upon which relator's counsel claims that his imprisonment is illegal may be divided into two, viz.: (1) That the ordinance is void; and (2) that, even if the ordinance is valid, the complaint upon which he was convicted was insufficient. After judgment the sufficiency of the complaint cannot be reviewed or considered on habeas corpus, but only on appeal. Habeas corpus takes cognizance only of defects of a jurisdictional character, which render a proceeding, not merely voidable, but absolutely void. State, Noonan, v. Hennepin County Sheriff, 24 Minn. 87. If the court had jurisdiction, and the ordinance is valid, so that a good complaint could have been made under it, then the judgment of the court was not void, but merely voidable, although the complaint may have imperfectly stated the facts constituting the offense charged. It is urged that the ordinance is invalid, for the reason that the city charter gives the common council no authority to require licenses of those engaged in the scavenger business; that there is no express or specific grant of any such power; that the general grant of powers above enumerated merely gives the council authority to regulate such a business; but that power to regulate does not include power to license. As § 4, under which relator was convicted, applies only to licensed persons, it is undoubtedly true that if the sections of the ordinance relating to licensing are invalid, § 4 would fall with them. In determining whether the general powers thus granted include the power to license, it is important to consider, first, the definition of "scavengers" contained in the ordinance, and, second, the relation which the scavenger's business, as thus defined, bears to the public health and comfort. The business of scavenger, as defined in the ordinance, and the only business which it assumes to deal with, is the cleaning and removing the contents of privy vaults, cess pools, sinks, and private drains. The subject-matter dealt with is one requiring the adoption of very stringent rules and regulations. The public health and comfort imperatively require that this kind of work should be performed only by competent persons, supplied with the proper outfit to do it with despatch, and in such a way as not to spread disease, or to prove offensive to the inhabitants of the city. It is also necessary, in order that the public officials may be enabled to supervise the work, so as to see that it is done properly, and in accordance with such rules and regulations, that they shall know in advance, not only when and where it is to be done, but also by whom it is to be done, in order that they may ascertain that he has at hand the proper outfit with which to do the work.

It is undoubtedly the law that the right to license must be plainly conferred, or it will be held not to exist. The power to make by-laws relative to specified lawful occupations, or the general power to pass prudential by-laws in reference to them, would not, as a general rule, authorize the municipal corporation to exact a license from those carrying on such business. But, in view of the very important bearing which the scavenger business has upon the public health, and the imperative necessity, from sanitary considerations, that such work should be intrusted only to those who are competent and properly equipped to perform it, we are of the opinion that the grant of power to make such regulations and to ordain such ordinances as may be necessary or expedient for the preservation of health, and to prevent the introduction of contagious diseases, conferred authority on the common council, as one means of regulating the scavenger business, to require a license from those carrying it on, and to prohibit anyone from doing so without a license. Boehm v. Baltimore, 61 Md. 259; Chicago Packing & P. Co. v. Chicago, 83 Ill. 221, 30 Am. Rep. 545; Kinsley v. Chicago, 124 Ill. 359.

It must be remembered, however, that the power to exact a license from scavengers cannot be exercised arbitrarily, so as to give any person or persons an exclusive right or monopoly of the business. The council should exercise their judgment and discretion honestly and intelligently, for the purpose of ascertaining whether the applicant is a competent person, and has the adequate outfit and other means with which to properly do the work, and then grant or refuse the license, in accordance with the result of such investigation. The provisions of the ordinance in question are entirely consistent with the equal enjoyment of its privileges by all citizens who are competent to perform this kind of work in a manner consistent with the public welfare. There is nothing in it requiring or contemplating any arbitrary exercise of power, and the presumption is that the power will be properly exercised.

No objection is made to § 3, providing for the payment of a license fee of $25, and therefore we have not considered it. Much of what has been said in regard to the power of the council to require a license is applicable to the provisions of § 4, requiring the licensee to obtain a "permit" from the commissioner of health before removing the contents of any privy vault, etc. This does not and was not intended to give that officer a veto power over the action of the common council in granting a license. Nor does it give him any arbitrary discretion by which to withhold a permit from a suitable person properly equipped to do the work. St. Paul v. Lawton, 61 Minn. 537. This provision is not materially different, either in substance or purpose, from those found in many ordinances on other subjects; for example, requiring a permit from some officer, such as building inspector or city engineer, before doing certain work, such as erecting or repairing a building, doing a job of plumbing, making connection with a sewer, and the like. We are not aware that the validity of such provisions has ever been successfully disputed.

The object in requiring a permit from the commissioner of health is to insure that the scavenger is properly equipped to do the particular job in hand; that it will be done at a proper time; and, what is perhaps more important than anything else, that the commissioner of health may know when and where the work is to be done, so that he may supervise it, and see that it is performed in accordance with the rules and regulations on the subject. It is suggested that the commissioner of health might arbitrarily refuse a permit, in which case the applicant's only remedy would be by mandamus, to compel him to issue it, which would, under ordinary circumstances, be so inadequate as to amount to no remedy at all. This might be true in many other cases where a public officer refuses to do his duty, but this is no reason for holding a law or ordinance invalid. The subject, involving, as it does, the public health, is one which necessarily requires very stringent, and even somewhat drastic, rules and regulations. Moreover, the presumption is that every public officer will perform his duty.

Our conclusion is that none of the objections urged against the validity of the ordinance are well taken, and that the decision of the District Court must be affirmed, and the relator remanded to the custody of the respondent.

So ordered.

Chapter 107, Laws 1897, purporting to license and regulate hawkers and peddlers throughout the state, provides that the act shall not "be construed to prevent any manufacturer, mechanic, nurseryman, farmer, butcher, . . . selling, as the case may be, his manufactured articles, or products of his nursery or farm, or his wares, . . . as butcher, either by himself or employee." Held, the business of hawker or peddler is so far a legitimate and moral business that the legislature can regulate it only for the purpose of preventing it from becoming a nuisance; and, for that purpose, the distinctions attempted to be made between peddling by the manufacturer, mechanic, nurseryman, farmer, and butcher, as aforesaid, and the peddling of the same articles by the purchaser from these parties, constitute no proper basis for classification, but the classification so attempted is founded on no proper or natural distinction, but is arbitrary, and contravenes §§ 33 and 34 of article 4 of the Constitution.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Meurs. Stevens, O'Brien, Cole, & Albrecht, for relator:

No arbitrary distinction between different kinds or classes of business can be sustained; the conditions being otherwise similar.

State, McCue, v. Ramsey County Sheriff, 48 Minn. 239.

The leading, primary idea of a hawker and peddler is that of an itinerant or traveling trader who carries goods about in order to sell them, and who actually sells them to purchasers, in contradistinction to a trader who has goods for sale, and sells them, in a fixed place of business.

Stuart v. Cunningham, 88 Iowa, 191, 20 L. R. A. 430.

It is the manner of sale that makes a peddler.

Com. v. Gardner, 183 Pa. 284, 7 L. R. A. 666.

Licenses are imposed for revenue, or for regulation, or to give monopolies, or for prohibition.

Cooley, Taxn. 592.

The legislature has the right to confer upon a town, "the power of regulating any business which may act prejudicially upon the health, morals, or peace of the inhabitants."

St. Paul v. Troyer, 8 Minn. 295.

In itself peddling is a moral and lawful pursuit.

Duluth v. Krupp, 46 Minn. 438.

Being a moral and lawful pursuit the ground upon which a large license fee could be sustained is that the business "in cities" might become a nuisance unless the number of peddlers be restrained.

Duluth v. Krupp, 46 Minn. 438.

It certainly must be the manner of selling, not the nature of the thing sold or the individuality of the producer, that makes peddling such a nuisance that the number of peddlers must be restrained.

If the alleged license is not for revenue and does not regulate the occupation of peddling, it must be a license for giving a monopoly, or for prohibition, or for both.

Temple v. Sumner, 51 Miss. 18, 24 Am. Rep. 615.

Such a law is the result of an arbitrary and unreasonable exercise of class legislation.

Chaddock v. Day, 75 Mich. 527, 4 L. R. A. 809.

The right to buy, sell, barter, and exchange property is a necessary incident to its ownership, and, subject to reasonable regulations, is as much protected by this provision of the Constitution as is the ownership itself.

Carrollton v. Bazzette, 159 Ill. 284, 31 L. R. A. 522.

It would be unreasonable and unjust to make, under the same circumstances, an act done by one person penal, and if done by another not so; ordinances which have this effect cannot be sustained.

The general public is by this law deprived of its equal right to buy of a peddler, and a monopoly is established against both in favor of the town merchant.

Peoria v. Guenheim, 61 Ill. App. 878.

Messrs. H. W. Childs, George B. Edgerton, and S. A. Anderson for respondent.

Canty, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

Relator was by a justice of the peace convicted of peddling goods without a license in the town of Rose, in Ramsey county, contrary to chap. 107, Laws 1897, which provides:

"Sec. 1. No person shall hereafter be allowed to sell or expose for sale any personal property within any organized township within the state of Minnesota, as a peddler or hawker, without first obtaining a license therefor from the proper authorities of said organized township, in the manner hereinafter prescribed.

"Sec. 2. The township supervisors of every organized township in the state of Minnesota are hereby authorized and empowered to establish rates and prescribe rules for the issuing of licenses to hawkers and peddlers within the limits respectively of such organized township. The fee for such license in any organized township shall not exceed $30 per annum."

Section 8 provides that the town clerk may issue the license, and § 4 provides that, on conviction of peddling without a license issued as provided by the act, a fine of not less than $10 or more than $100, or imprisonment not exceeding ninety days, may be imposed.

Section 5 reads as follows: "Sec. 5. This act shall not be construed to apply to any persons traveling from place to place, soliciting orders for goods, wares, or merchandise, with or without samples, where such goods, wares, or merchandise are to be delivered by or through a person or corporation other than the one soliciting such orders; neither shall it be construed to prevent the sale accompanied by delivery of goods, wares, or merchandise to retail dealers; nor shall it be construed to apply to train boys; nor shall it be construed to prevent any manufacturer, mechanic, nurseryman, farmer, butcher, fish or milk dealer, selling, as the case may be, his manufactured articles, or products of his nursery or farm, or his wares, as a fish or milk dealer or butcher, either by himself or employee."

Relator was sentenced to imprisonment on such conviction, and sued out a writ of habeas corpus, claiming that this act is unconstitutional and void for two reasons: (1) It contravenes §§ 33 and 34 of article 4 of the Constitution, prohibiting partial class legislation; and (2) it permits an excessive and unreasonable amount of money to be demanded as a license fee. We will consider only the first ground. We are of the opinion that the act is unconstitutional on the first ground. Section 33, aforesaid, provides: "In all cases where a general law can be made applicable, no special law shall be enacted; and whether a general law could have been made applicable in any case, is hereby declared a judicial question, and, as such, shall be judicially determined without regard to any legislative assertion on that subject." Section 34 provides: "The legislature shall provide general laws for the transaction of any business that may be prohibited by § 1 [§ 33] of this amendment, and all such laws shall be uniform in their operation throughout the state." This court has often held that, under these sections, the legislature must treat alike all who are in the same condition, must make the law apply to a whole class, and cannot make a law which applies only to a part of a class. And the class must be selected on some distinction, or be defined by some principle, which might naturally or properly distinguish it from all other classes. We are of the opinion that these rules have not been complied with in the framing of this statute. It was proper to leave out of the class of persons to whom the act should apply several of the classes of the persons excepted by § 5 thereof. But other persons are excepted by § 5, who cannot be left out of the class covered by the act on any natural or proper distinction or principle. Thus, the manufacturer is allowed, by himself, and his employee, to peddle without license the wares of his own manufacture. The legislature can regulate the business of hawker or peddler only for the purpose of preventing it from becoming a nuisance. The business is inherently moral and legitimate in itself, but there is in it a tendency to abuse, as many irresponsible, clamorous, and intrusive persons engage in it. It cannot be held, on any sound principle, that peddling may not become a nuisance as well when the peddler or his employer has manufactured the wares he peddles as when someone else has manufactured them. This act allows the manufacturer of brooms, tinware, patent medicine, or any other articles, whether manufactured in this state or elsewhere, to employ the most obnoxious and irrepressible peddlers to hawk his wares for him without license, while no peddler can buy the same goods from the manufacturer, and peddle them on his own account, without a license. For the purposes of a law to prevent peddling from becoming a nuisance, we cannot, on any proper basis of classification, distinguish between the peddling of goods by the manufacturer and his servant, and the peddling of the same goods by the purchaser from the manufacturer. Thus, when the object of a law was to prohibit the nuisance arising from the emitting of dense smoke from chimneys, the law was held unconstitutional because it excepted from the operation of the act the chimneys of manufacturing establishments. State, McCue, v. Ramsey County Sheriff, 48 Minn. 289. The distinction was held to be arbitrary, and the classification improper. In the same manner as the act here in question attempts to distinguish between peddling by the manufacturer and his servant and peddling by the purchaser from such manufacturer, it attempts to distinguish between peddling by the farmer or nurseryman and peddling by the purchaser from such farmer or nurseryman; between peddling by the butcher and peddling by the purchaser from such butcher. These distinctions are arbitrary and no proper basis for classification. This disposes of the case.

The act in question is unconstitutional, and the conviction under it is illegal and void.

It is ordered that the relator be, and he hereby is, discharged from custody. Let judgment be entered accordingly.

Mitchell, J.:

While I concur in the result I do not wish to place the decision of the case exclusively upon §§ 83 and 84, art. 4, of the Constitution. I am of opinion that, even if these sections had never been adopted, the act in question would have been invalid as "class legislation," because repugnant to § 2, art. 1, of the Constitution, which declares that "no member of the state shall be . . . deprived of any of the rights or privileges secured to any other citizen thereof unless by the law of the land."

TENNESSEE SUPREME COURT.

T. J. BIGLEY et al., Appls.,

v.

W. S. WATSON et al.

(98 Tenn. 353.)

1. The rule that a decree which is not confined to matters presented in the pleadings is subject to avoidance does not apply to a consent decree when the court had jurisdiction of the parties and of the subject-matter.
2. The disability of coverture of a party to a consent decree who does not avoid it in her lifetime will not prevent the decree from being binding on those claiming under her after her death.
3. An estate by curtesy cannot attach to a mere life estate.
4. A remainder will be regarded as vested rather than contingent if the disposition is so obviously upon the border as to be inherently doubtful between the two.
5. A remainder to the children of a woman who has an estate for life is not extinguished until her death, although she may be very old and childless, as the law does not assume that there is an impossibility of issue at any age, however great.
6. The fee is not in abeyance while a remainder is contingent under a consent decree in partition giving one party a life estate with remainder at her death to her children then living or the issue of such as may be dead, but the fee abides with her during such contingency, and if the line of remaindermen is extinct at her death her title is freed from the remainder and subject to disposal by her will.
7. The statute abrogating the rule in Shelley's Case (Acts 1851 and 1852, chap. 91, § 1) by providing that, on the termination of a life estate with remainders to heirs or heirs of the body of the life tenant, such heirs shall take as purchasers by virtue of the remainder so limited to them, gives no right to "heirs" to whom no remainder was limited as against devisees of one who was not only a life tenant but in whom the fee abode subject to a contingent remainder to her surviving children or issue of children, when by the extinction of the line of her descendants during her life the remainder failed and her title at the moment of her death became absolute.

NOTE.—Since the court adopts the view of "the minority with the better reason," and concedes that the majority of the authorities may be against it, no attempt will be made here to marshal the authorities for and against the position.

APPEAL by complainants from a decree of the Court of Chancery Appeals affirming the decree of the Chancery Court for Davidson County which dismissed a bill filed to establish title by inheritance to certain real estate and to remove clouds therefrom. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. Stokes & Stokes for appellants.

Mr. Morton B. Howell for appellees.

Mr. W. O. Vertrees guardian ad litem.

Caldwell, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

This is a proceeding in equity to set up title by inheritance to certain real estate, to remove clouds from that title, and to have an account of rents and profits. The chancellor, hearing the cause on its merits, dismissed the bill, and the court of chancery appeals affirmed his decree.

George W. Boyd died, testate, many years ago; and by his will, probated in 1880, gave considerable real estate to his widow and four children,—one son and three daughters. The widow dissented from the will, and procured an allotment of dower. In the course of time the widow died, and the property covered by her dower passed, under the will, to the four children. Subsequently one of the daughters died, intestate, unmarried, and without issue. Thereupon the other three children, all of whom were married, and the husbands of the two daughters, filed a joint ex parte petition in the chancery court of Davidson county to have the real estate previously covered by the dower and that owned by the deceased daughter partitioned among the three surviving children in equal parts. Steps appropriate to that end were taken under the direction of the chancellor; and final decree, devesting and vesting title, was passed in November, 1854. By this decree the title to a tract of 56 acres and to a town lot, assigned to Mrs. Sarah A. Watson, one of the surviving daughters, was vested in her "for her sole and separate use during her life, and at her death to her children then living, and the issue of such as may be dead." Mrs. Watson then had two children, but both of them died, without issue, in her lifetime. She herself died in 1893, and by her will devised the real estate just mentioned to her husband, W. S. Watson, the father of her children. He went into possession under the will, and, as a devisee of his wife, sold the 56 acres, and mortgaged a part of the town lot. In 1895, the complainants in this cause, as heirs at law of Mrs. Watson, filed their bill against her husband and his conveyees to recover the whole of said property, to remove his conveyances as clouds upon their title, and to have an account for mesne profits.

The theory of the bill, briefly stated, is that Mrs. Watson, having only a life estate, could not effectively devise the remainder; and that, having left no children, nor the issue of children, the remainder did not become vested in them, but upon her death descended to her heirs at law. Answering, the defendants say, in substance: (1) That so much of the partition decree as undertook to cut down her interest in her own land to a life estate was coram non judge, and void; and (2) that, treating that decree as valid, she nevertheless had power to devise the remainder; because the contingency upon which it was to vest never happened; and (3) that, in any event, Watson is entitled to a life estate as tenant by the curtesy. It is undoubtedly true that the partition decree is somewhat broader than the pleading. The petition under which that decree was rendered sought only a division of the lands among the three claimants; while the decree went further, and divided the fee of Mrs. Watson into a life estate and remainder, giving the former to her, and the latter to her children and their issue living at her death. It is well settled that a decree should be confined to the matters presented in the pleadings, and that an adjudication of other matters is coram non judge, and, for that reason, subject to avoidance. Gilreath v. Gilliland, 95 Tenn. 888; Rogers v. Breen, 9 Heisk. 679; Randolph v. Merchants' Nat. Bank, 9 Lea, 68, and cases cited. This rule, however, does not extend to consent decrees rendered in causes where the court had jurisdiction of the parties and of the subject-matter. Pacific R. Co. v. Ketchum, 101 U. S. 289, 25 L. ed. 982; Nashville, C. & St. L. R. Co. v. United States, 118 U. S. 261, 28 L. ed. 971; 5 Enc. Pl. & Pr. 962; Boyce v. Stanton, 15 Lea, 347. The decree here impeached by the defendants falls within this exception to the general rule, and must therefore be treated as operative in all its parts. Mrs. Watson was in the court of plenary jurisdiction upon her own petition, and with full knowledge of her rights she and her husband assented to, and, through their counsel, procured, the decree in question. It matters not, in this proceeding, that Mrs. Watson was a married woman at the time, for decrees entered by consent of persons under the disability of coverture or infancy are avoidable alone by original bill, and then only for good reasons shown. Jones v. McKenna, 4 Lea. 680; Mugroove v. Luak, 2 Tenn. Ch. 580; Wall v. Bushby, 1 Bro. Ch. 484; 2 Dan. Ch. Pl. & Pr. 5 Am. ed. *974. In any and every aspect of the question the decree was binding on Mrs. Watson so long as she elected to let it stand. She did not, in fact, avoid it in her lifetime; hence, it was in force at her death, and is now binding on those claiming under her. By the plain terms of the decree Mrs. Watson reserved to herself only a life estate. This being so, and nothing else appearing, her husband is entitled to nothing as tenant by the curtesy. Curtesy cannot attach to a mere life estate. Beecher v.

Hicks, 7 Lea, 207; Alexander v. Miller, 7 Heisk. 81; 2 Kent, Com. *184. That part of the decree which adjudged that the lands allotted to Mrs. Watson should pass 'at her death to her children then living, and the issue of such as may be dead' created a valid contingent remainder in fee. The interest given was a remainder in fee, because it comprised the whole residue of the estate (4 Kent, Com. *198; 2 Bl. Com. 164; 2 Washb. Real Prop. 5th ed. 585); and it was contingent, rather than vested, because limited to take effect in 'dubious and uncertain' persons, as under Blackstone's first class and Fearn's fourth class of contingent remainders. 2 Bl. Com. 169; 1 Fearn's, Contingent Remainders, 8-9; 4 Kent, Com. *206, 207; 2 Washb. Real Prop. 608, 614.

It is not amiss to remark in passing that "the lines of distinction between vested and contingent remainders are so nicely drawn that they are sometimes difficult to be traced" (4 Kent, Com. *204), and that in those instances where the disposition is so obviously upon the border as to be inherently doubtful between the two, the doubt will be resolved in favor of the former, for the reason that the general law favors the vesting of estates at the earliest practicable moment. This remainder failed, because the line of remaindermen became totally extinct before the happening of the event upon which alone it could possibly have vested. The only two children born to Mrs. Watson, the life tenant, died, without issue, years before her death; consequently she died without children 'then living,' and there was no one to take the remainder, as such.

This suit was brought, as before recited, to solve the problem of the present ownership of the property, complainants asserting their right to it as heirs at law of Mrs. Watson, and the defendants claiming it through her will to her husband. In deciding the question it is important to inquire first when the remainder fell. If it was extinguished immediately upon the death of the longer liver of her two children, or at any other time in advance of her own death, Mrs. Watson at that moment became the absolute owner of the whole estate and unquestionably had plenary power to dispose of it by will to her husband, or to anyone else, subject to his right as tenant by the curtesy. On the other hand, if the remainder ceased only at the very instant of her death, the controversy between the heirs and the devisee as to the better title becomes more interesting. It is not difficult to state a case in which a remainder would cease effectually anterior to the termination of the life estate. For instance, if land be given to A for life, with remainder in fee to B if living at A's death, and B dies first, the remainder is completely extinguished at the moment of B's death, and the donor may thereafter deal with the fee the same as if the remainder had never been created. Mrs. Watson was an old woman when she died, and it is suggested that on account of her advanced age she was entirely incapable of bearing other children for years after the death of the two born to her when younger, and therefore that the remainder came to an end, and she was again full owner of the land some time in advance of her own decease, and while she still survived. This suggestion, so far as involving a conclusion of law, is unsound, because based upon an assumed impossibility of other issue to Mrs. Watson after she had grown old. Lord Coke says: "The law seeth no impossibility of having children" (Co. Litt. 28); and Blackstone says: "A possibility of issue is always supposed to exist, in law, unless extinguished by the death of the parties, even though the donees be each of them an hundred years old." 2 Bl. Com. 125. This rule of law has been recognized and applied in several American cases. In State v. Lash the supreme court of New Jersey briefly remarked that "by the common law the possibility of issue is commensurate with life." 16 N. J. L. 888. In a comparatively recent case the supreme court of Pennsylvania used this emphatic language, namely: "The rule has stood the test of time, and received the sanction of ages. . . . Nature has fixed no certain age, by years, at which a child-bearing capacity shall begin and end. . . . The presumption of law is in favor of issue, notwithstanding advanced age." List v. Rodney, 88 Pa. 428. This court, in deciding the case of Garner v. Dowling, said: "It is stated in the bill that Mrs. Garner [the life tenant] is past the time of life when she may be reasonably expected to have any children, but her age is not shown, and if it were, in legal contemplation it is not impossible she may have children, and the contingency is not determined until her death." 11 Helsk. 52. See, to same effect, 2 Sharswood & B. Lead. Cas. Am. Law of Real Prop. 251-258, citing this case and others. So, then, this remainder was subsisting after Mrs. Watson's children died and she grew old, and was extinguished only at her decease. Her heir and her devisee both appear, claiming under her as of that time, and dispute with each other as to the better right. "Connected with the favor shown by the law to the heir is the rule that where a person who is heir of his ancestor is also made a devise, by that ancestor, of the exact estate which, had there been no will, he would have taken as heir, he shall be held to be in by descent as to the worthier title." 8 Sharswood & B. Lead. Cas. Am. Law of Real Prop. 450. "A devise to the heir at law is void, if it gives precisely the same estate that the heir would take by descent if the particular devise to him was omitted out of the will. The title by descent has, in that case, precedence to the title by devise." 4 Kent, Com. *506. "It is well settled that one who holds the same estate by devise, that the law casts on him by descent, is in by descent, and not by devise." Hoover v. Gregory, 20 Yerg. 451. Manifestly, this rule with respect to the worthier title is unavailing and inapplicable in this case, for the reason that the heir at law and the devisee are distinct persons; the devise is not to the person who would take by descent in the absence of the will.

Having ascertained that the remainder created in the decree was in fee, that it was contingent, that it never became vested, and that it terminated at the death of the life tenant, and not sooner, for the lack of someone to take it, the next pertinent inquiry is: Where did the inheritance have its abode in the meantime,—in the donor, Mrs. Watson, on the one hand, or in abeyance, in nubibus, in gremio legis, on the other hand? Fearné says: "Where a remainder of inheritance is limited in contingency by way of use, or by devise, the inheritance in the meantime, if not otherwise disposed of, remains in the grantor, and his heirs, or in the heirs of the testator, until the contingency happens to take it out of them." Fearné, Contingent Remainders, p. 351. Kent lays down the same rule in the language following: "If a contingent remainder be created in conveyances by way of use, or in dispositions by will, the inheritance, in the meantime, if not otherwise disposed of, remains in the grantor or his heirs, or descends to the heirs of the testator, to remain until the contingency happens. The general and equitable principle is of acknowledged authority." 4 Kent, Com. *257. It should be borne in mind, however, that these learned authors, in the language quoted from them respectively, refer alone to dispositions by way of use or by will, and not to all dispositions. They are not in harmony when they come to consider the residence of the inheritance pending the contingency if the remainder be created by common-law conveyance. As to this question there has been great contrariety of opinion from the Year Books down to the present time. Fearné would have the rule uniform, and have it apply alike to each of the three cases,—to dispositions by way of use, by way of devise, and by common-law conveyance,—leaving the inheritance in the last case with the grantor until it could vest in the grantee in remainder. By way of criticism of what others have said to the contrary, he observes: "These opinions are founded on an assumption that the remainder must pass out of the donor at the time of the livery, and, consequently, that no estate shall remain in him after such livery; and therefore in the case of a lease to one for life, remainder to right heirs of J. S.; the remainder, they tell us, is in abeyance, or in nubibus, or in gremio legis, though by way of some sort of compromise between common sense, and the supposition of an estate passing out of a man, where there is no person in rerum natura, no object besides hard and hardly intelligible words for the reception of it, at the time of the livery; they are compelled to admit such a species of interest to remain in the grantor, as upon the determination of the estate before the contingent remainder can take place, entitles the grantor or his heirs to enter and reassume the estate. . . .

It must be an object of no small curiosity, to understand how a remainder can pass from a donor until there exists some donee to receive it of him; if it passes at all, the conclusion rather seems to be, it passes to somebody; and whilst it does not pass to anybody, one might suppose it does not pass at all. And, however profound a solution of this difficulty may be discoverable by adepts in legal lore, under the expressions, 'in abeyance,' 'in nubibus' or 'in gremio legis,' I cannot but think it a more arduous undertaking to account for the operation of a feoffment or conveyance, in annihilating an estate of inheritance, or transferring it to the clouds, and afterwards regenerating or recalling it at the beck of some contingent event, than to recouple to the principles, as well of common law as of common sense, a suspension of the complete or absolute operation of such feoffment or conveyance, in regard to the inheritance, till the intended channel for the reception of such inheritance comes into existence; in any case at least, where a present estate of freehold passes in the meantime, as the immediate and initiate subject of the operation of such conveyance. . . . To whom, then, could it ever have passed out of the grantor? And from whom could it ever return to him? Where is the sense in saying, a remainder must pass out of the grantor in a case where you deny it ever passed at all to the grantee or anybody else? Or that livery must have its immediate operation in a case where it is admitted to have left the estate in the same plight exactly as if it had never been made at all? Would there not be better sense in considering the disposition itself, in all these cases, as put in suspense, till the event or contingency referred to decides its effect? What is there to move the subsisting estate in the lands from the grantor, before the alienation of it takes effect? That alienation may, indeed, rest in abeyance or expectation till the contingency or future event gives it operation. And it is that, rather than the resipied inheritance, to which, during its mere potential undecided operation, the allusion of—caput inter nubila condit—seems most applicable." Fearné. Contingent Remainders, pp. 360-363. Kent expresses his view in narrower limits, when he says Fearné "treated with ridicule the notion that the fee was in abeyance, or in nubibus, or in mere expectation or remembrance, without any definite or tangible existence; and he considered it as an absurd and unintelligible fiction;" and then for himself remarks. "Of the existence of such a technical rule of the common law there can be no doubt. The principle was, perhaps, coeval with the common law, that during the pendency of a contingent remainder in fee upon a life estate, as in the case already stated, the inheritance was deemed to be in abeyance. . . . Though the good sense of the thing, and the weight of liberal doctrine, are strongly opposed to the ancient notion of abeyance, the technical rule is that livery of seisin takes the reversion or inheritance from the grantor, and leaves him no tangible or disposable interest. Instead of a reversion, he has only a potential ownership, subsisting in contemplation of law, or a possibility of reverter; and Mr. Preston insists that an estate of freehold depending on another estate of freehold, and limited in contingency, must be in abeyance, and not in the grantor. The fee passes out of the grantor, and a vested estate of freehold necessarily precedes the remainder, and the inheritance is in contingency as well against the grantor, who has no power over it, as against the person to whom the contingent remainder is limited. Mr. Preston confidently asserts that the argument of Mr. Fearné, however abstractly just and reasonable, is without authority, and contrary to all settled technical rules. Another able writer [Cornish] also contends that the doctrine of abeyance was never shaken or attacked until Mr. Fearné brought against it the weight of his eloquence and talents." 4 Kent, Com. 258-260. In a note following these pointed observations are found these words: "There can be no doubt, though good sense was with

Mr. Fearné, that the book authorities are against him. We cannot surmount the technical rule, if technical rules are binding in questions on property. The one in this case deduces its lineage from high antiquity. It is found in the Year Books, and is dispersed over Plowden and Coke. . . . The fee will take an occasional flight to the clouds, and cannot be stayed, for common sense is disabled, and pierced by the longe fallente sagitta." Id. 260, note. Blackstone employs this language: "The fee simple or inheritance of lands and tenements is generally vested and resides in some person or other; though divers inferior estates may be carved out of it. As if one grants a lease for twenty-one years, or for one or two lives, the fee simple remains vested in him and his heirs; and after the determination of those years or lives the land reverts to the grantor or his heirs, who shall hold it again in fee simple. Yet sometimes the fee may be in abeyance,—that is (as the word signifies), in expectation, remembrance, and contemplation in law,—there being no person in esse, in whom it can vest and abide; though the law considers it as always potentially existing, and ready to vest whenever a proper owner appears. Thus, in a grant to John for life, and afterwards to the heirs of Richard, the inheritance is plainly neither granted to John nor Richard, nor can it vest in the heirs of Richard till his death, nam nemo est heres viventis; it remains therefore in waiting, or abeyance, during the life of Richard. This is likewise always the case of a parson of a church, who hath only an estate therein for the term of his life, and the inheritance remains in abeyance." 2 Bl. Com. 107. Without noting any distinction as to this question between conveyances by way of use and dispositions by will on the one side and common-law conveyances on the other, but seemingly treating them all as in the same plight in this matter before the law, a recent author speaks thus: "It was also involved in doubt, in early times, what became of the fee while the remainder continued to be contingent. Until the contingency happened, the contingent remainder was deemed a mere possibility,—a chance of getting an estate, rather than the estate itself. It was considered an executory interest, the title to which only vested when the contingency happened. Some of the older authorities held that the title to the fee remained, to use their quaint expressions, in nubibus, in gremio legis, etc. In other words, the title is kept in abeyance while the remainder is contingent. But the modern authorities are inclined to hold that it remains in the grantor, and that he is not divested of the title in remainder until the contingency arrives." Tiedeman, Real Prop. § 411. The cases cited to the proposition contained in the last sentence are Shupleigh v. Pilsbury, 1 Me. 280, and Rice v. Osgood, 9 Mass. 38. Each of them involved the construction of a grant to the ministry, and held that the title to the fee remained in the grantor until the happening of the event upon which it could vest; and to this extent there seems to be a departure in both cases from the rule announced by Blackstone in the last sentence quoted from him, supra. The latest pertinent case discovered by our research was before the supreme court of Kentucky. In the course of the opinion and as the legal basis of the decision, the court said: "That an estate in fee may be made to pass out of the grantor so as to remain in abeyance, in the clouds, in no person, pending the existence of the particular estate, seems to be well settled, notwithstanding the able argument of Mr. Fearne to the contrary." Bohon v. Bohon, 78 Ky. 410. The instrument under which the litigation arose in that case was a common-law conveyance, and not a will, or a deed by way of use.

Such are the leading authorities on both sides of this vexed question. They preponderate in favor of the proposition that by a rule of the ancient common law the fee in the supposed case was left in abeyance, rather than in the grantor. But they, at the same time, show with greater preponderance that the reverse would have been far more just and reasonable; and it is truly a matter of no small wonder that this purely technical rule should have survived the assault of Fearne for a single day. All the authorities agree, as they must of necessity do, that something must be in abeyance between the time of the common-law conveyance and the happening of the event upon which the contingent remainder must either cease entirely or become vested. The disagreement is in relation to the identity of that creature. The majority of the writers say it is the fee in the land; while the minority, with the better reason, say it is the conveyance of that fee. The majority say the fee leaves the grantor when he makes the deed, and wanders, none know where, pending the contingency, and then vests or reverts as the case may be; and the minority say it remains in the grantor, and that the deed becomes effective to pass it from him only when there is someone entitled to receive it. The latter view is acknowledged and adopted by all when the instrument is a conveyance by way of use, or a disposition by way of devise; and the only impediment in the way of its application to a common law conveyance is an ancient technicality, whose existence some forcibly deny, and which is confessed by its supporters to be against "the good sense of the thing," and against "the weight of liberal doctrine" as well. Conceding the original existence of this technical rule, and its firm place in the ancient common law, it may well be asked whether or not it deserves perpetuation in these modern times, when many of the technicalities and fictions of the common law of real property have passed away, and when every tendency is justly towards simplification of legal rules and uniformity of construction and procedure; and we would answer in the negative.

It must be remembered that the instrument here involved is not a deed in use, or a will, or a common-law conveyance, but a decree of court, and in that sense, sui generis. It partakes, however, to some extent, of the nature, and possesses in some degree the elements, of both the first and the last. It is, in a measure, like a deed in use, and also like a common-law deed; and at the same time different otherwise from both of them. One of three tenants in common joins with the others in partition proceedings, and therein procures a decree vesting the title to her allotted share in herself for life, with remainder at her death to her children then living, and the issue of such as may be dead. Thus she may be said to have bound herself to stand seised to her own use for life, and to preserve the fee while she lived, so that the possession and ownership might pass to the intended remaindermen, if in esse, at her death; and in this view the inheritance, in the meantime, continued its abode in her, and, because there was no remainderman to take when she died, the remainder then ceased forever, and the will which she had made to her husband became operative and passed to him the whole estate. In the case of Loring v. Elliot, it appeared that Mrs. Hildreth, before marriage, conveyed her land to her father in trust, for the use of herself for life, with remainder to her children, if she should leave any. Having no children when she came to die, she undertook to dispose of the land by will. After her death her heirs at law claimed the land, and her devisees also claimed it. In deciding the controversy the court held that Mrs. Hildreth had an equitable reversion which she could lawfully devise, and that the claimants under her will were entitled to a conveyance from the trustee. 16 Gray, 568, 574. In so far as the decree involves the idea of a use or trust, it is essentially different from a common-law conveyance; and it is like a common-law deed, and unlike a conveyance by way of use, in that there is no interposition of a third person to stand as a technical or active trustee. Other points of similarity and dissimilarity need not be mentioned.

It is said for the complainants that this case must be controlled by the statute abrogating the rule in Shelley's Case [1 Coke, 88]; but that cannot be so, for the reason that the facts here—the decree and what followed—do not present the question intended to be answered by that enactment. The rule mentioned was abolished in this state by § 1, chap. 91, Acts 1851–52 (Williams v. Williams, 10 Helsk. 568; Hurst v. Wilson, 89 Tenn. 271), which is as follows: "Where a remainder is limited to the heirs, or to the heirs of the body, of a person, to whom a life estate in the same premises is given, the persons who, on the termination of the life estate, are heirs, or heirs to the body of such tenant, shall take as purchasers, by virtue of the remainder, so limited to them." Code 1858, § 2008; Mill. & V. Code, § 2814; Shannon's Code, § 3674.

Obviously none of the claimants in this case were contemplated as beneficiaries under the partition decree; they were in no sense embraced as remaindermen; hence the statute has no application to them. Those to whom it applies "shall take as purchasers, by virtue of the remainder so limited to them," and not as heirs of the life tenant. Complainants had no remainder limited to them, and for that reason they can take nothing "by virtue of the remainder." The object of the statute was to give the remainder exactly the effect indicated by the grantor or testator, and in the very persons intended by him, and to prevent it from passing otherwise, or to different persons.

UNITED STATES CIRCUIT COURT OF APPEALS, EIGHTH CIRCUIT.

W. S. McCORNICK, Plff. in Err.,
v.
WESTERN UNION TELEGRAPH COM-

(40 U. S. App. 118, 79 Fed. Rep. 449.)

1. The provision of the Utah Constitution under the authority given by the act of Congress for the transfer of causes pending in the territorial courts of which the Federal courts do not have exclusive jurisdiction upon motion or petition under and in accordance with the act or acts of Congress does not require the application for removal to be made by the defendant before pleading or at any specified time before trial.
2. The power given by the act of Congress to the constitutional convention of Utah to provide for the transfer of actions pending in the territorial courts to the state or Federal courts is not an invalid delegation of the power of Congress, as Congress has power to create local legislative bodies and invest them with legislative powers.
3. The act of Congress admitting Utah as a state by accepting and ratifying the state Constitution invested all its provisions with all authority conferred by any act of Congress, even if the power given to provide for the transfer of causes pending in the territorial courts to the state and Federal courts was an invalid delegation of the power of Congress.
4. A telegraph company is not liable to a banker who cashes a draft upon the faith of a telegram from the drawee purporting to authorize the drawer to make such a draft, because of a mistake in transmitting the amount for which the draft is authorized, as the company cannot be liable to a stranger to whom it has never delivered the message, and to whom it owes no duty whatever, merely because he has seen the telegram and acted upon it to his injury.

ERROR to the Circuit Court of the United States for the District of Utah to review a judgment in favor of defendant in an action brought to recover damages for failure to correctly transmit a telegram. Affirmed.

Before Saiborn and Thayer, Circuit Judges, and Lochren, District Judge.

Statement by Lochren, District Judge:

On October 18, 1892, George L. Frink, manager of the Glencoe Mining Company of the territory of Utah, applied to W. S. McCornick, the plaintiff, a banker of Salt Lake City, in said territory, with whom said mining company had an account, for a loan by way of overdrafts, to the amount of $7,500, which was declined, but with the statement that plaintiff would so loan such sum as one D. E. Soule, of New Milford, Connecticut, would authorize said Frink to draw for upon the said Soule. Thereafter, on the same day, said Soule, in the city of New York, delivered to the Western Union Telegraph Company, the defendant, a message, signed by him, to be telegraphed to said George S. Frink at Salt Lake City, to whom it was addressed, of the following purport: "May draw twenty-five hundred dollars at sight." By some error or mistake in transmission, the message, when delivered to Frink in Salt Lake City by the defendant's messenger, purporting to come from, and to be signed with the name of, said D. E. Soule, read: "May draw seventy-five hundred dollars at sight." Thereupon said Frink made on the same day a sight draft in favor of McCornick & Co. upon said D. E. Soule for the sum of $7,500, and upon the delivery thereof to the plaintiff, and the exhibition to said plaintiff of said telegram as received by said Frink, the plaintiff advanced and loaned to said Frink, by placing the same to the credit of said mining company, the sum of $7,500. Soule paid on said draft $2,500, and no more, and the draft was protested. In the meantime the mining company had obtained from plaintiff $7,276.68 of such loan. Frink and said mining company are insolvent, and the plaintiff seeks in this action to recover of the defendant $4,776.68, as his damages because of the negligence and carelessness of defendant and its agents in the transmission and delivery of said telegram. The complaint was filed July 20, 1893, in the district court of the third judicial district of the territory of Utah, in and for Salt Lake county, and the answer of the defendant was filed in the same court on September 23, 1893, and the cause was pending in that court when, on January 4, 1896, the state of Utah was admitted into the Union. On February 1, 1896, the defendant filed in the district court of the third judicial district of the state of Utah, county of Salt Lake, its petition for the removal of this cause to the circuit court of the United States for the district of Utah, on the ground that the amount in dispute, exclusive of interest and costs, exceeded $3,000, and that defendant was a citizen and resident of the state of New York, and the plaintiff a citizen and resident of the state of Utah. Defendant filed at the same time a proper bond for the removal of said cause, and thereupon, on the 21st day of February, 1896, by the order of the judge of said state court, said cause was removed for trial to said circuit court of the United States for the district of Utah, which last-named court afterwards denied the plaintiff's motion to remand said cause to the state court. Afterwards the said cause came on for trial at a regular term of said United States circuit court, and at the close of the evidence the jury, in obedience to the direction of the court, returned their verdict in favor of the defendant, and judgment was thereupon rendered in favor of the defendant for its costs.

Lochren, District Judge, delivered the opinion of the court:

1. The cause was properly removed to the United States circuit court. The right of removal in this case did not depend on the act of March 3, 1887 (24 Stat. at L. 552, chap. 373), as amended by the act of August 13, 1888 (25 Stat. at L. 433, chap. 866), in relation to the removal of causes from the state to the Federal courts, which is inapplicable to suits pending in the courts of a territory. Such right of removal rested entirely upon the provision made by Congress for the special purpose of removing into the Federal courts such causes pending in the territorial courts of Utah, when such courts should cease to exist, on the admission of the new state, as might, conformably to the Constitution of the United States, be removed to the Federal courts for trial. By the act of Congress enabling the people of Utah to form a Constitution and state government, the convention provided for was empowered to provide by ordinance "for the transfer of actions, cases, proceedings, and matters pending in the supreme or district courts of the territory of Utah, at the time of the admission of the said state into the Union, to such courts as shall be established under the Constitution to be thus formed, or to the circuit or district court of the United States for the district of Utah, and no indictment, action, or proceeding shall abate by reason of any change in the courts, but shall be proceeded with in the state or United States courts, according to the laws thereof respectively." Act July 16, 1894 (28 Stat. at L. 107, 111, chap. 188, § 17).

Pursuant to this authority, the convention, in § 7 of art. 24 of the Constitution of Utah, ordained: "All actions, cases, proceedings, and matters which shall be pending in the district courts of the territory of Utah, at the time of the admission of the state into the Union, whereof the United States district or circuit courts might have had jurisdiction, had there been a state government at the commencement thereof respectively, shall be transferred to the proper United States circuit and district courts respectively; and all files, records, indictments, and proceedings relating thereto shall be transferred to the said United States courts. Provided, that no civil actions other than causes and proceedings of which the said United States courts shall have exclusive jurisdiction, shall be transferred to either of said United States courts, except upon motion or petition by one of the parties thereto, made under and in accordance with the act or acts of Congress of the United States; and such motion not being made, all such cases shall be proceeded with in the proper state courts."

Under these provisions, civil actions pending in the territorial district courts when the state was admitted, of which the United States courts had not exclusive jurisdiction, would remain in the state courts, unless a party thereto should move or petition for the removal, and the motion or petition was to be made under and in accordance with the acts of Congress. This means that the application and proceeding should, in form, conform to similar proceedings under the acts of Congress, and show the jurisdictional facts which would warrant the assumption of jurisdiction by the Federal court. It does not mean that the application for removal must be made before pleading by the defendant, or at any specified time before trial. The language used covers all cases so pending in the territorial courts "whereof the United States circuit or district courts might have had jurisdiction, had there been a state government at the time of the commencement thereof respectively." The provision should be so construed as to give effect both to the intention of Congress and of the convention. Koenigsberger v. Richmond Silver Min. Co. 158 U. S. 41, 39 L. ed. 889. To hold that no case pending in the courts of the territory of Utah could be removed, except such as came entirely under the removal act of 1897, is to hold that the congressional provision in the enabling act, and the provision in the Utah Constitution, are alike futile and meaningless, and that nothing but the act of 1897 has any 88 L. R. 2A.

force in respect to the subject. It is argued that Congress cannot delegate its legislative power to any other body, and therefore the provision in the Utah Constitution is void. It may be admitted that Congress may not delegate its general powers of legislation on subjects affecting the whole people. But it has never been doubted that Congress may, in respect to any designated district or territory outside of all the states, and therefore within its absolute control, create a local legislative body, and invest it with legislative powers. This has been done in respect to all of the organized territories, although the power of Congress remains complete over them, so that it can disorganize them, or abrogate any law passed by the local legislature, or make enactments for a territory as if it had no legislature. The constitutional convention of Utah was a governmental body, which Congress could properly provide for, to aid in preparing for the change from territorial existence to statehood, and which it could properly invest with authority to provide for all the details incident to such change. One of these unavoidable details was the proper distribution and placing of the causes pending in the territorial courts, which would go out of existence with the change. The argument, however, has no foundation. The act of Congress which admitted Utah as a state accepted and ratified its Constitution, and invested all its provisions with all authority conferred by any act of Congress.

2. The defendant telegraph company, by its contract with the sender of the telegram, made in consideration of payment for the service, was bound to him to transmit his message correctly, and would be liable to him for any damage he might sustain as the direct result of failure to perform such contract, except in so far as such liability had been lawfully limited by the terms of the contract. It also owed a duty to the person to whom the telegram was addressed, and to whom it was delivered by the telegraph company to be acted upon, to exercise care that the telegram so delivered should be authentic and accurate. The cases of May v. Western U. Telegr. Co. 112 Mass. 90, and Elwood v. Western U. Telegr. Co. 45 N. Y. 549, sustain the right of a person to whom a telegram is addressed and to whom it is delivered by the telegraph company, to recover for damage caused by negligence of the character indicated. But a telegraph company cannot be liable to a stranger to the company and to the telegram,—one to whom it has never delivered the message, and to whom it owes no duty whatever,—merely because he has seen the telegram, and acted upon it to his injury. Western U. Telegr. Co. v. Wood, 13 U. S. App. 317, 57 Fed. Rep. 471, 21 L. R. A. 706; National Sav. Bank v. Ward, 100 U. S. 195, 25 L. ed. 621.

The direction to the jury was correct, and the judgment is affirmed.

OKLAHOMA SUPREME COURT.

FIRST PRESBYTERIAN CHURCH of Perry, Pff. in Err.,
v.

S. P. MYERS.

1. Voluntary religious associations and churches, organized to assist in the expression and dissemination of religious doctrine, may, by their governing bodies, prescribe rules and regulations for their church government and discipline, and such rules and regulations will be obligatory upon the members, congregations, and officers of such general association, and will be given effect to by the civil courts.

2. It is the right of such religious unions or associations thus to establish tribunals for the decision of questions arising among themselves, and such decisions will be binding in all cases of ecclesiastical cognizance in matters of doctrine and discipline and to the extent of controlling the terms upon which the pastoral

*Headnotes by MCATTEE, J.

NOTE.—Liability for salary of pastor.

The question of liability for salary of pastor is governed by the rules which govern in cases of contracts generally. If a valid contract has been made for the payment of salary it will be enforced. If no valid contract has been made no recovery can be had as upon a contract. If services have been rendered in the absence of a contract there is some conflict as to whether or not a recovery can be had on a quantum meruit. The answer will depend largely on the rules governing the particular denomination to which the church is attached.

Taxes, subscriptions, etc.

Before the religious denominations in this country became strong, the custom was to support the pastor by individual subscription, public taxation, or endowment.

A subscription for the payment of the pastor's salary may be enforced. Somers v. Miner, 9 Conn. 465.

If a decision of an inferior tribunal of the church deposing the minister has been reversed on appeal and the minister reinstated, the subscriptions of the parishioners for his support are enforceable. Dieffendorf v. Reformed Calvinist Church, 20 Johns. 12.

If the members of the church sign a paper promising to pay the amount set opposite their names, each one is not liable for the full aggregate amount of the subscriptions. Riddle v. Stevens, 2 Serg. & R. 537.

If persons choose to give money to a person acting as a minister it is his right to receive it without regard to whether he rightfully or wrongfully officiates in such capacity, and he cannot be enjoined from receiving such voluntary contributions merely because he has been deposed from the ministry by some ecclesiastical judicatory. Calkins v. Cheney, 32 Ill. 463.

In Huntington v. Ripley, 1 Root. 323, it appears that it was the custom to assess the pastor's salary on the members of the church, and in case payment was not made suit was brought to enforce payment.

When a town has settled a minister an action will lie for his salary against the town notwithstanding there may be several unincorporated religious societies within the town the members of which may relation shall be formed and the salary accompanying it shall be demanded; and the church judicatory having the jurisdiction on this matter, under the rules and regulations prescribed by the chief governing body of the church, shall be the exclusive judge, within the jurisdiction prescribed by such rules and regulations, as to whether the pastoral relation shall be formed between a minister of the denomination and one of the churches of such voluntary association.

3. According to the usage and form of government of the Presbyterian Church, a "call" made out by the congregation duly convened, in which the amount of salary is fixed and inserted in the "call," does not become effective under the rules and regulations of that church until such call is placed in the hands of the minister to whom it is addressed, and is deemed equivalent to a request of the congregation and of the pastor-elect for installation as a pastor, but the pastoral relation can only be formally consummated with the formal sanction of the presbytery; and the refusal of the presbytery to place the call in the hands of the minister, or to install him, puts an end to the civil contract.

be exempted from contributing to the support of such minister. Cochran v. Camden, 15 Mass. 296.

An itinerate circuit rider of the Methodist Episcopal church cannot maintain an action to recover from a parish the money which has been paid under the tax assessment for the support of the gospel in that parish, from the mere fact that he has occasionally preached there. Washburn v. Fourth Parish of West Springfield, 1 Mass. 32.

A person who has contracted to officiate to two societies in two several towns cannot maintain an action for the taxes paid by his hearers for the support of public worship. The Constitution provides for the support of a public religious teacher in each parish by taxation. Kendall v. Kingston, 5 Mass. 524.

And to render the pastor regularly settled the society must be incorporated. Barnes v. First Parish in Falmouth, 6 Mass. 401; Turner v. Second Precinct in Brookfield, 7 Mass. 60; Lovell v. Parish of Byfield, 7 Mass. 230.

A contract for services is binding.

In Taylor v. Gay, 1 Sid. 409, an action was upheld on a contract to pay the plaintiff for preaching and teaching, although he was the vicar.

A parish cannot discharge its liability to its settled minister at its pleasure by simply passing a resolution that his services are no longer required. Avery v. Tyringham, 3 Mass. 182, 3 Am. Dec. 106; Peckham v. North Parish in Haverhill, 16 Pick. 274.

In Youngs v. Hansom, 31 Barb. 49, which was a case to enjoin the minister from officiating in a church, it is held that where a minister is called and settled in charge of an Episcopal church he cannot be dismissed without his consent except by the bishop of the diocese.

A rector of an Episcopal church may recover the salary provided in the original contract until dissolution of the pastoral relation, in the manner provided by the canons of the church. He cannot be forced to leave the pastorate by a reduction of his salary. Bird v. St. Mark's Church, 62 Iowa, 567.

In an action by a minister for his salary after his parish has voted to dismiss him, the parish cannot give evidence of previous immorality on his part not stated in its vote as a ground of dismissal. Whitmore v. Fourth Cong. Soc. 2 Gray, 308.

Ministers of the Methodist church are entitled to ERROR to the Probate Court for Noble County to review a judgment in favor of plaintiff in an action brought to recover the alleged contract price for services as pastor of the defendant church. Reversed.

Statement by McAtee, J.:

The petition averred the incorporation of the church, and the employment of the plaintiff by it from the 16th day of September, 1893, to the 15th day of March, 1894, upon an oral contract, upon which he claimed a balance for services in the sum of $50, all of which has been paid since the incorporation of the church, except the sum of $12, which includes interest, and charged to be due. The plaintiff further averred that from the last-named date, March 16, 1894, to the 15th day of March, 1895, he was employed by the defendant under an agreement, partly oral and partly in writing, the terms of which were that he was to receive the sum of $200 for his services as minister; that the services were rendered, and were worth that sum, and that the defendant promised to pay the amount claimed. A small amount had been credited on this sum, received from va-recover for their services as ministers whatever salary their congregations have contracted to pay them. Jones v. Congregation of Mount Zion, 30 La. Ann. 711.

If the contract is that a committee shall annually value the salary according to the price of the necessities of life, and that the salary shall be increased when the necessities rise in price, and decreased when they fall, the minister will be bound by the valuation of the committee unless it acts unfairly, partially, or corruptly. Burr v. First Parish in Sandwich, 9 Mass. 277.

Persons who sign a written agreement to pay a certain amount for the support of a certain person as minister so long as his services are employed cannot rescind the contract without the consent of the other party, but while the services are rendered their liability may be enforced. First Religious Soc. v. Stone, 7 Johns. 112.

If the trustees neglect to apply the revenue of the church to the payment of the minister's salary he may recover it by action against the corporation. Ebaugh v. German Reformed Church, 3 E. D. Smith, 60.

If the contract is that the minister will give his services for the amount of the subscriptions that have been made for his support which the church is to collect, the church may be held liable for whatever amount it might have collected but failed to collect. Myers v. Baptist Soc. in Jamaica, 38 Vt. 614.

The call of the rector by the vestry and the acceptance of such call create a contract for the payment of the stipulated salary so long as the pastoral relation continues. This contract is a valid right which the courts will enforce. Jennings v. Scarborough, 56 N. J. L. 401.

A priest cannot be removed from a church by a bishop so as to deprive him of the right to the rent of the pews of the church which is his only source of revenue, without cause. O'Hara v. Stack, 90 Pa. 477.

But that decision was repudiated in Stack v. O'Hara, 98 Pa. 213.

Interference with performance.

The fact that the pastor has not performed his offices in the church for a given time will not prevent his recovering his salary for that time if he offered to perform his duty but was prevented from doing so by the official members of the church. Whitney v. First Eccl. Soc. in Brooklyn, 5 Conn. 405.

That the minister preached in private houses upon being prevented from using the meeting house will not prevent his recovering his salary as minister. Thompson v. Catholic Cong. Soc. 5 Pick. 439.

If the minister is at all times ready to perform all the duties growing out of the pastoral relation, and in fact performs such duties as the parish permits him to perform, he is entitled to the stipulated sum as long as the relation continues. Sheldon v. Congregational Parish in Easton, 24 Pick. 231. 38 L. R. A.

Abuse of contract.

No recovery can be had for services if the association does not employ the minister or make any contract with him, express or implied, for services. So, where a congregation is permitted to use the church and to select the minister the religious society which owns the church will not be liable for his salary if it never enters into a contract with him. Downs v. Bowdoin Square Baptist Soc. 19 Mass. 135.

Unless the trustees as such are parties to the contract employing the pastor, no action can be sustained against the society as such for his salary. Although the contract by them need not be express, but it seems may be implied. Miller v. Baptist Church & Congregation, 16 N. J. L. 251.

The fact that the trustees as individuals sign a subscription paper for the raising of the pastor's salary does not make their action official so as to bind the society. Landers v. Frank Street M. E. Church, 114 N. Y. 635.

Under the New York statutes the salary is to be fixed by a majority of the persons who are entitled to elect trustees at a meeting to be called for that purpose and ratified by the trustees, and if the salary is fixed merely by the quarterly conference of the church no action will lie for its recovery. And it is further said that under the rules of the Methodist Episcopal Church no contract can be made binding the church to pay any particular amount of salary. Landers v. Frank Street M. E. Church, 97 N. Y. 119. Reversing Landers v. Frank Street M. E. Church, 15 Hun. 340. where it was held that the statutes providing a method of fixing the salary do not prohibit another method, and if the minister furnished services at the request of the society under an understanding that he was to be compensated, a promise is implied to pay him therefor upon which an action may be maintained.

There may be a valid implied contract for the services of the minister which may be enforced, the statute prescribing no form of contract except in the particulars mentioned, and if the amount of salary which is to be paid can be ascertained the court will enforce the contract. Pendleton v. Waterloo Baptist Church, 49 Hun. 593.

A person who has never become a pastor of a church according to its rules cannot recover for services rendered as such even upon a quantum meruit, and persons who sign a call which was not accepted are not liable for the payment of compensation as individuals. Nell v. Spencer, 5 Ill. App. 461.

If the call has not been accepted, but services are rendered pending the decision, no permanent obligation rests upon the church, and it may terminate the services when it chooses to do so; but for the services rendered the rate of compensation fixed in the call may be referred to and properly adopted as a measure of compensation. West v. First Presby. Church, 41 Minn. 24, 4 L. R. A. 692.

IN FIRST PRESBYTERIAN CHURCH v. MYERS et ious members of the church, and there remained due upon this item, as he claimed, $192. The plaintiff averred for a third cause of action a certain oral contract and agreement made with the defendant, by which he agreed to serve them as minister from the 16th day of March, 1895, to the 15th day of September, 1895, which services were to be rendered for the sum of $100, upon which the sum of $72 had been paid to him from the treasurer of the church and by the president of the board of trustees, leaving a balance due thereon of $28. A copy of the written part of the contract referred to was filed with the petition marked "Exhibit A," and is as follows:

recovery is denied for lack of contract, but the question of recovery on quantum meruit is not settled.

Absence of incorporation.

The persons who sign the call to a minister who performs services as pastor in response to it are responsible for the salary where there is no incorporation of the society. Thompson v. Garrison, 22 Kan. 765.

If the deacons and elders of the church which is not incorporated enter into a contract with a minister for services, and after the church becomes incorporated the services are continued and accepted by the church and the contract having been assumed by it under its seal, no action will lie against the deacons and elders for arrears of salary. Van Vlieden v. Welles, 6 Johns. 85.

In Baldwin v. McClinch, 1 Me. 102, the court, in considering the question whether or not a certain person was a minister within the statutory exemption from taxation, says: "We do not see how an unincorporated society as such can obligate itself to its minister in such a manner as to create a legal liability on its part."

Dissolution of pastoral relation.

If the minister is suspended by the proper authority, and his relation to the church is finally dissolved, he cannot recover for his salary during the time of his suspension. Reformed Protestant Dutch Church v. Bradford, 8 Cow. 457.

A rector of an Episcopal church whose relation to his congregation has been dissolved by recommendation of a committee appointed by the bishop according to the custom of the church, can recover only the amount of salary recommended by the committee until the time when his relation was to cease. Perry v. Wheeler, 12 Bush, 544.

Entitled to compensation.

Nicholson v. Daniel, 152 Pa. 461, was a suit to compel a minister to account for money which he had received to carry on the work, and it appeared that he had started a mission and collected money with which a chapel was built, and some charitable work done, and a balance applied to his own salary amounting to a little less than $1,500 per year, and the court allowed him to keep it and reversed a ruling of the master requiring him to turn over part of it to the trustees of the building fund.

A clergyman who enters into a contract with a vestry for services to the church may maintain an action against the church for his salary, although the vestry was illegally elected if he did not know of the illegality, but if he did know of it he cannot recover. St. Luke's Church v. Mathews, 4 Desauss. Eq. 572, 6 Am. Dec. 619.

Individual liability.

If a rector gives a person a title to the bishop, and thereby appoints him curate of his church, promising to allow him a salary and to continue him in office until otherwise provided of some

In Stewart v. Martin, 18 U. C. Q. B. 480, where it appeared that a committee of the church was elected annually, and members of the committee for one year were sued for salary upon a contract made by the committee of the previous year without anything to show that the members were the same in both years: the court says there is no principle of law which makes the members of a church committee chosen for one year liable for the engagement entered into by a committee which had served for a previous year. And it was held that the action was improperly brought.

Members of an unincorporated religious society, who through their trustees and priest who had power to incur debts stated an account with an ex-priest of the amount due him for salary and advances, may be held individually liable upon the indebtedness. *Sheehy v. Although in Vermont it has been held that the church property cannot be taken on execution to satisfy a judgment for salary of the pastor. Bigelow v. Congregational Soc. of Middletown, 11 Vt. 283.

So, the communion service of the church is not liable to seizure on execution to pay the pastor's salary. Lord v. Hardie, 82 N. C. 241, 83 Am. Rep. 682.

Attest: J. O. Young, Moderator.

The defendant church answered, and filed its cross bill for an accounting, in which it was declared that the defendant expressly denied the employment and agreement alleged; that it had never obligated itself to pay the sum of $50 for the first six months referred to, but averred that the plaintiff was employed to come to Perry to serve as a minister for the Presbyterian church at the time when there was no such church in existence, and without the knowledge of the defendant as a church, or any of the members afterwards constituting the defendant corporation, and was so employed by the Board of Home Missions of the National Organization of the Presbyterian Church in New York City, and at the sum of $400 for the said period of six months; that said amount was paid by said New York board, and received by the plaintiff, and that he had collected a complete compensation for the services rendered, and that the employment had been accepted by the plaintiff at that salary, and that the people comprising the congregation of the church afterwards made a voluntary and free-will offering of $50 to the plaintiff in addition to the amount for which he was so employed, and which was paid to him, and that he therefore received an excess of the amount for which he was employed, to wit., the sum of $450, for the six months of service referred to in the first cause of action. The defendant further denied that from the 16th day of March, 1894, to the 15th day of March, 1895, the plaintiff was in the employment of the defendant, and denied that there was any contract and agreement entered into between the plaintiff and defendant whereby the plaintiff was to serve as a minister for the defendant during the said period of time, and that it ever agreed to pay him $200, or any sum, for his services during that time, or that any money was ever paid to the plaintiff by the defendant or any of its members upon the pretended contract for $200, and it averred that the plaintiff was again employed as a home missionary or "stated supply" for this field by the Board of Home Missions referred to, at the sum of $600 for the said year from March 16, 1894, to March 15, 1895, and that said amount was paid by the New York board of missions, and received by the plaintiff, and that he had full and complete compensation for his services, and there was nothing due the plaintiff. In answer to the third cause of action, the defendant admitted that it had employed the plaintiff from March 16, 1895, to September 15, 1895, and agreed to pay him the sum of $100 therefor, but averred that different sums had been paid to plaintiff at different times amounting to almost the entire sum, and more than the amount of $72.50, which plaintiff admits he had received on that account; but that the plaintiff had volunteered and agreed to collect the amount of $100 for the members of the defendant corporation, and did make collections, but refused to account for them, and had made collections from the citizens of Perry, for the purpose of erecting a church edifice for the defendant congregation, and that he had refused to account for such sums, and that upon the accounting of the moneys thus collected and appropriated the defendant believed that such amount would show that the plaintiff was fully paid.

The plaintiff replied under oath to answer and cross petition of the defendant, denying all its allegations except the service of the notice therein mentioned. The plaintiff introduced evidence in support of his petition, and the defendant introduced evidence consisting to a "large extent of documentary evidence, introduced and marked as exhibits for identification, and brought here with the case made, consisting of 'The Rules and Form of Government of the Presbyterian Church and the different bodies thereof, to wit, the General Assembly, the Synod, the Presbytery, and the Local Churches.'" The plaintiff introduced evidence of an original "call," marked "Exhibit A," filed with his petition, to the introduction of which the defendant objected. Evidence was introduced showing that the services declared upon in the petition were well and faithfully performed, and worth the sum stated in the plaintiff's petition, and in support of the other allegations of his petition. It was admitted in the plaintiff's testimony that he had served the defendant corporation as minister only, and never served as pastor; and it was further admitted by the plaintiff that the "call" introduced by him in evidence had never been presented to him or confirmed by the presbytery in whose jurisdiction the local church, the defendant, was situated.

The defendant introduced the following documentary evidence, being extracts from the Rules and Form of Government of the Presbyterian Church, and extracts from the records of minutes and transactions of the presbytery in whose jurisdiction the defendant church is situated: Chapter 10. Of the presbytery: "A presbytery consists of all the ministers, in number not less than five, and one ruling elder of each congregation, within a certain district." "(13) The presbytery has power to receive and issue appeals from the church sessions, and references brought before them in an orderly manner; to examine and license candidates for the holy ministry; to ordain, install, remove, and judge ministers," etc. "(15) Of the election and ordination of bishops or pastors: 1. When any probationer shall have preached so much to the satisfaction of any congregation as that the people appear to desire to elect a pastor, the session shall take measures to convene them for the purpose; and it shall always be a duty of the session to convene them, when a majority of the persons entitled to vote in the case shall, by a petition, request that a meeting be held. 2. When such meeting is intended, the session shall solicit the presence and counsel of some neighboring minister to assist them in conducting the election contemplated, unless highly inconvenient on account of distance, in which case they may proceed without such assistance.

4. On the day appointed, the minister invited to preside, if he be present, shall . . . announce to the people that he will immediately proceed to take the votes of the electors of that congregation for a pastor, if such be their desire; and, when this desire be expressed by a majority of voices, he shall then proceed to take votes accordingly. . . . (5) When the votes are taken, if it appear that a large minority of the people are averse from the candidate who had a majority of the votes, and cannot be induced to concur in the call, the presiding minister shall endeavor to dissuade the congregation from prosecuting it further. But, if the people be nearly or entirely unanimous, or the majority shall insist upon their right to call a pastor, the presiding minister in that case, after using his utmost endeavors to persuade the congregation to unanimity, shall proceed to draw a call in due form, and to have it subscribed by the electors; certifying at the same time, in writing, the number and circumstances of those who do not concur in the call. All proceedings shall be laid before the presbytery, together with the call. (6) The call shall be in the following or like form, viz: 'The congregation of —, being, on sufficient grounds, well satisfied of the ministerial qualifications of you, —, and having good hopes, from our past experience of your labors, that your ministrations in the gospel will be profitable to our spiritual interests, do earnestly call and desire you to undertake the pastoral office in said congregation; promising you, in the discharge of your duty, all proper support, encouragement, and obedience in the Lord. And, that you may be free from worldly cares and avocations, we hereby promise and oblige ourselves to pay to you the sum of —, in regular quarterly (or half year or yearly) payments during the time of your being and continuing the regular pastor of this church. In testimony whereof, we have respectively subscribed our names this — day of —, A. D. —. Attested by A. B., Moderator of the Meeting.' "(9) The call thus prepared shall be presented to the presbytery under whose care the person shall be; that, if the presbytery think it expedient to present the call to him, it may accordingly be presented; and no minister or candidate shall receive a call but through the hands of the presbytery."

The defendant then offered the following extracts from journal of minutes of meetings of Oklahoma Presbytery: "Meeting of April 88 L. R. A.

11, 1894. Home Missions. The report of the committee on home missions was received, and its recommendations adopted, and is as follows: '(8) We recommend the church at Perry to the Board of Home Missions for the sum of $1,000, less the amount of money which the field shall be able to raise. We recommend as supply of the church the Rev. James Farr, a senior in Princeton Seminary. Submitted by the committee. F. W. Hawley, Chairman.' A call was presented from the First Presbyterian Church of Perry for the Rev. S. P. Myers as pastor. The presbytery declined to place the call in Mr. Myers' hands." "Called meeting, June 19th, 1894. A paper was received from the Perry Church, setting forth the grounds of its grievance at the action of the presbytery in relation to that church, and asking that the action of presbytery taken April 11th, 1894, regarding the work at Perry, be rescinded. On motion the paper was laid on the table. A call from the Perry Church for the installation of Rev. S. P. Myers was received, and laid on the table. Rev. S. P. Myers was appointed stated supply of the Perry Church for one year beginning March 16th, 1894, and the field was recommended to the Board of Home Missions for aid to the amount of $800."

The defendant offered, among others, the following instructions: "(8) The jury are instructed that the written instrument relied upon by plaintiff in support of his second cause of action, and denominated a 'call,' is not, under the government and rules of the Presbyterian Church, by which both parties hereto are bound, a contract or obligation binding upon the church. And it being admitted that such 'call' was not presented to plaintiff by the presbytery controlling this territory, such call must not be considered as, alone, fixing any liability upon the defendant corporation. (4) The jury are instructed that unless they find from the evidence that subsequent to the presentation and rejection of the call the defendant corporation, by its proper officers or agents, and in the manner and form prescribed by the government and rules of such church (by which both parties hereto are bound), entered into a contract with the plaintiff whereby the defendant promised to pay plaintiff for the services set up in his second cause of action the sum of $200 in addition to the amount received by him from the Board of Home Missions, then plaintiff cannot recover upon his second cause of action. But if you do find that such contract was, after the refusal of the presbytery to extend the call, so entered into, then you will find for the plaintiff upon said second sum." The judge refused to give these instructions offered by the defendant numbered 8 and 4, to which ruling of the court exceptions were reserved. The jury found for the plaintiff, and assessed the amount of his recovery at $238. Motion for a new trial was heard and overruled.

Mr. F. H. Kellogg for plaintiff in error.
Mr. Henry Rucker for defendant in error.

McAtee, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

It was assigned as error (1) that the paper denominated a 'call' was admitted in evidence over the objection of the defendant, and (2) that the court erred in refusing instructions numbered 8 and 4 asked by the plaintiff in error. The defendant in error argues in his brief that, as the only errors assigned are those of the court in regard to the admission of documentary evidence designated as a "call," and the instructions given and refused, all such entire evidence is not before the court, and the court must affirm the judgment of the trial court. The case made is certified to by the probate judge as "a true and correct statement of all the pleadings, motions, orders, evidence, findings, proceedings, and judgment in said action." We cannot say, in the presence of this certificate, that the evidence is not all here. The probate judge before whom the evidence was taken and the case tried certifies that it is all here, and the assignments of error will be considered upon that statement. The proposition is, upon the merits of the case, whether the plaintiff below had a right to regard the "call" made out by the officers of the defendant corporation as a contract made with him directly, or whether, as the plaintiff in error contends, the "call" was a tentative proposition for a contract which could not become effective without the concurrence of the presbytery of the church; that the defendant in error was, like the plaintiff in error, bound by the rules and regulations prescribed by the "form of government of the Presbyterian Church in the United States of America," and that these had to be complied with in order to establish the pastoral relation which is here claimed by the plaintiff, and that, inasmuch as, under these rules and regulations, no minister or candidate shall receive a call but through the hands of the presbytery, and if it be true that the presbytery never placed the "call" in the defendant in error's hands, that as a matter of law it was noneffective for any purpose, and ought not to have been admitted to show the written part of the contract alleged in the petition, and ought not to have been given to the jury to consider for any purpose in behalf of the defendant in error. Questions of a similar character in which the legal effect of the rules and regulations adopted by the chief governing bodies of the churches in this country, and the effect of the action of their various judicatories, together with the rules and regulations which they adopt, have been considered in the supreme courts of a number of the states, and to a certain extent by the Supreme Court of the United States; and it has been uniformly held that wherever religious associations have been organized to assist in the expression and dissemination of religious doctrine, and have created for their direction in matters of doctrine, church government, and discipline tribunals within the association, and that the final and controlling effect of the ecclesiastical polity thus formed upon the individual members, congregations, and officers within the general association will not be questioned, but will be given effect to in the civil courts; and that all who unite themselves to such a body do so with the implied consent to submit to the system of ecclesiastical control, and are bound by it; and that it would be vain consent, and would lead to the total subversion of such religious bodies, if anyone aggrieved by one of their decisions should appeal to the secular courts, and could thus have that voluntary control which they had thus agreed to reversed and destroyed; and that it is of the essence of these religious unions and it is their right thus to establish tribunals for the decision of questions arising among themselves, that those decisions should be binding in all cases of ecclesiastical cognizance in matters of doctrine and discipline, and that this control goes to the extent of controlling the terms upon which the pastoral relation shall be formed, and the salary accompanying it shall be demanded. It was said in the case of Watson v. Jones, 80 U. S. 13 Wall. 679, 20 L. ed. 666, in the Supreme Court of the United States, by Justice Miller, that: "Nor do we see that justice would be likely to be promoted by submitting those decisions to review in the ordinary judicial tribunals. Each of these large and influential bodies (to mention no others, let reference be had to the Protestant Episcopal, the Methodist Episcopal, and the Presbyterian Churches), has a body of constitutional and ecclesiastical law of its own, to be found in their written organic laws, their books of discipline, in their collections of precedents, in their usage and customs, which as to each constitute a system of ecclesiastical law and religious faith that tasks the ablest minds to become familiar with. It is not to be supposed that the judges of the civil courts can be as competent in the ecclesiastical law and religious faith of all these bodies as the ablest men in each are in reference to their own. It would therefore be an appeal from the more learned tribunal in the law which should decide the case, to one which is less so." The opinion proceeds further to say that "in the very important case of Chase v. Cheney, 58 Ill. 509, 11 Am. Rep. 95, recently decided in the same court, Judge Lawrence, who dissented, says: 'We understand the opinion as implying that in the administration of ecclesiastical discipline, and where there is no other right of property involved than the loss of the clerical office or salary as an incident to such discipline, a spiritual court is the exclusive judge of its own jurisdiction, . . . and its decision of that question is binding upon secular courts.' And he dissents with Judge Sheldon from the opinion because it so holds." And it is further said that "we cannot better close this review of the authorities than in the language of the supreme court of Pennsylvania, in the case of the German Reformed Church v. Com., Seibert, 8 Pa. 291: 'The decisions of ecclesiastical courts, like every other judicial tribunal, are final, as they are the best judges of what constitutes an offense against the Word of God and the discipline of the church. Any other than those courts must be incompetent judges of matters of faith, discipline, and doctrine; and civil courts, if they should be so unwise as to attempt to supervise their judgments on matters which come within their jurisdiction, would only involve themselves in a sea of uncertainty and doubt which would do anything but improve either religion or good morals.' It cannot be otherwise than concluded that, in order to maintain the unity of the faith and doctrine as held in either of the voluntary religious associations of this country, the individual opinions of the pastors placed in authority and charge over the various churches of the denominations respectively should be the proper subject of ecclesiastical control and discipline, to be treated of and regulated by the various authoritative church bodies and judicatories to which each respectively belongs. And that in the presence of rules and regulations, if such are found to have been made by the supreme governing body of such a voluntary association, the various members, congregations, and officers who have voluntarily associated and have subscribed to such rules and regulations and books of discipline shall be bound by them, and, as in this instance, to the extent of holding that the right to salary is an incident to such discipline, and that the spiritual court provided for in the book of discipline is the exclusive judge of its own jurisdiction, and that its decisions upon all questions touching the establishment of the pastoral relation, if treated of and the terms upon which that relation is provided for in such books of discipline, are final, and binding on the secular courts. And this is the view which has been held and fully announced in the case of West v. First Presby. Church, 41 Minn. 94, 4 L. R. A. 692. In that case the call was extended to the plaintiff regularly by the presbytery, but was never formally accepted by him. It was therefore contended that he had never become a regular pastor of the church. The opinion holds that "according to the usage and form of government of the Presbyterian Church, the call is made by the congregation duly convened, and the amount of compensation or salary is fixed by it, and inserted in the call. . . . But the pastoral relation can only be established with the consent, and under the authority and direction, of the presbytery having jurisdiction. The call and proceedings of the parties under it are subject to the usages and discipline of the church, and the courts will not interfere any further than is necessary to ascertain and protect the strict legal rights of the parties. The call made by the congregation is submitted to the presbytery, and, if approved by that body, and accepted by the candidate, the pastoral relation is then formally constituted by installation by or under the direction of the presbytery, and usually as soon as conveniently may be. The call and its acceptance are deemed equivalent to a petition and request of the congregation and pastor-elect for such installation; but, as the pastoral relation can only be finally consummated with the formal sanction of the presbytery, so that judicatory may withdraw its approval, and refuse to proceed with the installation, and, according to its rules and established usage, it will refuse to do so if at the time appointed therefor the congregation then declines to receive the candidate as their minister. The presbytery, it appears, has the supervision and care of the churches in a particular district in connection with it, and in general has authority to order whatever pertains to their spiritual welfare, so that it may approve and establish the pastoral relation, or disapprove and annul it, and a dissolution of the pastoral relation, or a refusal to install, puts an end to the civil contract."—citing Robertson v. Bullions, 9 Barb. 185; Con- nitt v. Reformed Protestant Dutch Church, 4 Lans. 339. And it was held in Paddock v. Brown, 6 Hill, 532, that "the form, character, and purpose of it, as well as the authority whence it issues, will be seen by referring to the fifteenth chapter of the form of government, etc., of the Presbyterian Church (Const. of the Presby. Church, 1842, p. 436), which may be resorted to, upon established principles of law, in order to arrive at the true meaning and legal effect of the 'call.' It will there be found to be an instrument issuing from the congregation, which may be signed either by the elders and deacons, by the trustees, or by a select committee, and attested by the moderator of the meeting. In the case before us it did so issue, was signed by three elders and one trustee, and attested by the moderator. The plaintiff was himself a minister of the Presbyterian denomination, and was, of course, familiar with the prescribed mode of proceedings preparatory to and in making out of a 'call' in due form." The question in that case was one as to the liability of the congregation itself or of the trustees. No question arose as to the action of the presbytery upon the call, and consequently no action of the presbytery was requisite in order to make the "call" valid. The case was decided in 1844, and it is cited here solely for the purpose of showing that the courts will consider the call, its form, character, and purpose, and will charge the minister who may sue with knowledge of the prescribed mode of proceedings preparatory to and in the making out of a "call" in due form. Other authorities are: East Norway, L. N. Evangelical Lutheran Church v. Halvorson, 42 Minn. 503; State, Watson, v. Farris, 45 Mo. 183; McGinnis v. Watson, 41 Pa. 31; McRoberts v. Moudy, 19 Mo. App. 26; Powers v. Budy, 45 Neb. 208; Kuns v. Robertson, 154 Ill. 894; Krecker v. Shirey, 163 Pa. 534, 29 L. R. A. 476; Pounder v. Ashe, 44 Neb. 672; Juker v. Com., Fisher, 20 Pa. 484.

Adopting the views thus uniformly expressed, it is manifest that, inasmuch as the rules and regulations of the Presbyterian Church require that a "call" should be made out by a regularly called meeting of the congregation, and when thus made out it should be presented to the presbytery under whose care the person called shall be, and that, if the presbytery think it expedient to present the call to him, it may accordingly present it, and no minister or candidate shall receive a call but through the hands of the presbytery, and that, if the presbytery had declined to place the call in the plaintiff's hands, then it could never have been effective, nor could ever have been so considered by the defendant in error. The plaintiff himself admitted that the call had never been presented to him, or confirmed by the presbytery in whose jurisdiction the local church, the defendant, was situated; and that, while he was serving the defendant church during the period, he served them as minister only, and never as "pastor." The call itself provides in express terms for a "pastorate." It is an invitation to the plaintiff to undertake the pastoral office of said congregation, and creates a compensation upon the condition of "your being and continuing to be the regular pastor of said congregation." Leaving out of view that control and effect which this court must concede to the judicatory termed "Presbytery" in the Presbyterian Church system, it is here admitted by the plaintiff that he never undertook the work to which the call offered by him in the case and introduced in evidence invited him,—that is, that he never became the regular pastor of said congregation; and upon this contention alone it would appear that he must fail in this action unless it be held that the casual service termed "ministration" is held to be equivalent to and identical with the service, office, and responsibility of the "regular pastor" filling the pastoral office. But this cannot be, since a minister is one who, having been ordained to the ministry, undertakes to perform certain services for another, while a pastor is one who has been "installed according to the usage of some Christian denomination in charge of the specific church or body of churches." Century Dict. titles, Minister, Pastor; Webster Dict. same titles. And under the form of government of the Presbyterian Church it is one who has been installed by the presbytery itself over the particular church, and that they have approved the "call" made out by the congregation, and placed the same in his hands, and he has accepted it. The "call" specifies that the compensation shall be paid for "services as our pastor." We hold that the "call" should not have been admitted in evidence to prove the contract in the absence of evidence to prove the contract here sued upon, but that the court should, as a matter of law, have instructed the jury that the written instrument relied upon by the plaintiff in support of his second cause of action, and denominated a "call," is not, under the government and rules of the Presbyterian Church, by which both parties are bound, a contract or obligation binding upon the church; and that, since it was admitted that the call was not presented to the plaintiff by the presbytery controlling this territory, the "call" should not have been considered, alone, as fixing any liability upon the defendant corporation.

The case will therefore be reversed, and remanded for further proceedings in accordance with these views.

All the Justices concur.

Joseph T. JONES, Appt.

(..... W. Va.)

- *1. Petroleum oil in place is part of the land. Its wrongful extraction by one lawfully in possession is waste, and by a stranger is trespass; in both cases irreparable injury, which may be enjoined.
2. It is waste in a tenant for life to take petroleum oil from the land, for which he is liable to the reversioner or remainderman in fee.
3. A tenant for life may work open salt or oil wells or mines even to exhaustion, without account, but cannot open new ones.
4. It is waste in a tenant in common to take petroleum oil from the land, for which he is liable to his cotenants to the extent of their right in the land.
5. Things part of the land, wrongfully severed by a tenant for life, become personalty, but belong to the owner of the next vested estate of inheritance in reversion or remainder, not the life tenant.
6. Where there is a life tenant, and timber or other thing part of the realty going to loss, and imperative need calls for it, equity may cause it to be cut or otherwise secured for the remainder-man or reversioner. Equity has power to do so, if it do no harm to the life tenant, or he be compensated.

7. Principles of estoppel in pais discussed.

8. If one claiming sole right to another's land spends money in improving or operating upon it, though ignorant of that other's right, the mere silence of that other will not estop him from asserting his title. He need not seek the other to tell him of his right, or speak at all, unless placed in such a situation as calls upon him to declare his right.

9. A purchaser at a judicial sale is conclusively held as having notice of all facts touching the rights of others in the property sold, disclosed by the record of the case.

10. Owners of vested estates in reversion and remainder, whether by legal or equitable title, are indispensable parties to a chancery suit to sell the fee; and the presence as parties of a tenant for life, or of the trustee holding for them, does not make them parties by representation, and a sale under the decrees will not affect or pass their right in the land.

11. A married woman cannot, by even fraudulent conduct, be barred under the principle of estoppel in pais from asserting her title to land, though separate estate; but as to her personal estate it is different. Now that she is enabled to contract as if single, she will be bound by estoppel in pais touching her contracts as if single.

12. An infant of years of discretion, by intentional fraudulent conduct, will be barred, under the doctrine of estoppel in pais, from asserting her title to either real or personal property against one misled thereby.

- 14. A remainderman or reversioner has jurisdiction in equity against a tenant for life to enjoin waste, and to have compensation for the damages, the same as if he sued at law, to avoid multiplicity of suits. The same is the case between tenants in common where one is guilty of waste.
- 15. A tenant for life, who, by waste, has severed from the realty things that are part of it, as petroleum oil, has no right to have their proceeds invested so he may have interest therein during the life estate, but their proceeds go at once to the owner of the next vested estate of inheritance.
- 16. One making permanent improvements on land as if his own, at a time when there was reason to believe his title good, is to be allowed their value, so far as they enhance the value of the land; but if, when making them, he has notice, actual or constructive, of the superior right of another, he cannot be allowed them.
- 17. One having notice of facts rendering his title inferior to another's, who, by mistake of law, regards his title good, cannot claim for permanent improvements.
- 18. Under the circumstances, a party taking petroleum oil unlawfully is allowed all costs of production, including costs of boring productive wells, as a set-off against rents and profits.

(June 11, 1897.)

A PPEAL by defendant from a decree of the Circuit Court for Tyler County in favor of plaintiffs in an action brought to enforce a division of the proceeds of oil obtained from property in which complainants claimed an interest. Reversed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Meurs, Caldwell & Caldwell, for appellants:

The remaindermen, although not named as parties in the consolidated chancery suits in which the land was sold, were real and actual parties in such suits.

The sale was evidently made in their interest and with their concurrence.

The fact that an action is prosecuted in the names of nominal parties cannot divest the case of its real character, but the issues made by the real parties, and the actual interests involved, must determine what persons are precluded from again agitating the questions, and who are estopped by the previous decision.

Freem. Judgm. 1st ed. § 174; 7 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law, p. 1; Tate v. Hunter, 3 Strobb. Eq. 147.

Extrinsic evidence is admissible to prove that a real party in a suit was not a party to the record, but that he prosecuted or defended the suit in the name of a nominal party.

2 Black, Judgm. § 539.

If the remaindermen did not desire and concur that the sale should be made, and did not acquiesce in such sale with full knowledge, as is the only reasonable inference from the facts appearing in this cause, why were not Mrs. Williamson, Mr. Benjamin Engle, Nancy Engle, Mr. David H. Stealey, and Miss Kate Stealey called and examined by plaintiffs as witnesses?

If, on the supposition that a charge or claim is unfounded, the party against whom it is made has evidence within his reach by which he may repel that which is offered to his prejudice, his omission to do so supplies a strong presumption that the charge or claim is well founded.

Jones*, 33 Ark. 845; Wallace v. Harris, 32 Mich. 894; Bindley v. Martin Bros. 28 W. Va. 774.

Captain Jones spent before this suit was brought over $200,000 in developing the land as oil territory and in buying out his partners, Haskell and Tennant. He acted, in making his expenditures on the property, in the bona fide belief that he had a perfect title, and the plaintiffs must have known that Capt. Jones so believed. The transaction spoke for itself; and there was no pretense at the hearing that they did not so understand.

Sumner v. Seaton, 47 N. J. Eq. 119.

For the plaintiffs to stand by as they did, under such circumstances, and preserve silence for eighteen months as to their claims, is held to be fraud.

Anderson, Law Dict. p. 416; Bigelow, Estoppel, 2d ed. p. 453, note 1; Goshorn v. Snodgrass, 17 W. Va. 766.

The holding back of material evidence by any party to a suit raises a presumption of fact against him, whenever it appears that he could have produced such evidence.

Brannon, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

I refer to the report of a former decision in this case for a full statement of the facts. 39 W. Va. 231, 25 L. R. A. 222. Under the judicial sale, Jones thought and claimed that he purchased the entirety of the two tracts,—one of 165 acres, and the other 45 poles; but, as seven undivided tenths vested by the will of David Hickman in Engle, as trustee, to hold for the use of his daughter Eliza Williamson for her life, with remainder to her sisters, and as the remaindermen were not parties to the suit, the decree of sale, and sale under it, were void and ineffectual to pass anything but the life estate in those seven tenths, and so the remainder in them did not pass under the sale, but remained in the sisters of Eliza Williamson. Jones, however, took exclusive possession, claiming the whole. He bored twenty-three wells in the pursuit and production of petroleum oil. The plaintiffs sued him in equity to enjoin his further production of oil, and for an account of what he had produced. After the decision upon a former appeal an account was taken, and the circuit court held that Jones pay the owners of the seven tenths of the land for one eighth of seven tenths of the oil produced, and seven tenths of the value of the timber taken from the land, thus charging Jones only for one eighth of the oil, that being the usual rent, commonly called "royalty" in that section stipulated and paid to the landowner under oil leases. Jones appeals, and he assigns error in charging him with anything at all, and for other causes; and the plaintiffs cross assign error in charging Jones only with one eighth, and for other causes.

We start with the fact that Jones was owner of three undivided tenths in fee in possession, and owner of a life estate for the life of Mrs. Williamson in the remaining seven tenths, and the plaintiffs owners of the remainder in fee in those seven tenths; after the end of the life estate, a vested remainder; and in this condition of right to the land Jones bored twenty-three wells upon the land, and produced from May, 1892, to December 21, 1895, 622,281 barrels of petroleum oil therefrom, valued at $500,298. Did he have right to bore for this oil? He claims that he had, and that every barrel of it is his, without liability to account to the plaintiffs; while the plaintiffs claim that he had no right to bore and produce this oil, but, having done so, he must account to them for full seven tenths. Did Jones, as tenant for life, have right to extract this oil. He had not. Petroleum oil, in its place in the land, is a part of the land itself, just as are coal, timber, and iron. Bettman v. Harness, 42 W. Va. 433, 36 L. R. A. 566; Williamson v. Jones, 39 W. Va. 281, 25 L. R. A. 222. A tenant for life cannot do anything entailing permanent injury to the estate of the remainderman or reversioner. He cannot, therefore, dig for gravel, lime, clay, stone, or the like; cannot open new mines for minerals. 1 Lomax, Dig. 54. If he take clay to make brick, not for repair of buildings, but for sale, it is waste. University v. Tucker, 31 W. Va. 622. It is the duty of the life tenant to protect the land from waste or injury even from others, and he must abstain from so doing himself. 1 Washb. Real Prop. p. 116, § 24; 1 Lomax, Dig. 57. Therefore, when Jones himself committed waste by boring for oil, he was a wrongdoer, so far as concerns his life estate. The remaindermen could sue him in an action of waste as at common law under the English statute of Marlbridge, or in action of trespass on the case under chapter 92 of the Code, and recover the full value of their seven tenths.

It is sought to show that Jones, as life tenant, had a right to all the oil, by the case of Koen v. Bartlett, 41 W. Va. 559, 31 L. R. A. 128; but that case will not sustain this claim. It asserts only that a tenant for life may use the land and its profits, including mines of oil or gas open when his life estate begins, or lawfully opened and worked during its existence. 33 L. R. A.

There the owner in fee had made a lease for oil, with a royalty as rent, and then conveyed the fee, reserving a life estate, and it was held that he, as life tenant, was entitled, as against the remainderman, to the royalty; but there the owner had authorized the boring for oil, and the conveyance was subject, in terms, to the lease, and, though the boring had not produced wells open at the commencement of the life estate, they were bored, under authority, during its continuance. We held that a mine bored in the period of life estate, under prior authority, was to be deemed as if an open mine at the commencement of the life estate. It is established that an open mine may be worked to even exhaustion by the life tenant. Crouch v. Puryear, 1 Rand. (Va.) 258, 10 Am. Dec. 528; 1 Lomax, Dig. 54. The offense of waste consists in the first penetration and opening of the soil, and it is not waste to dig in mines or pits already open, which have become part of the annual profit of the land. Taylor, Land. & T. § 249a. When Jones penetrated the soil, he did so without warrant from his life tenancy, and without warrant from the creator of the life estate. There was no open well, no antecedent authority to bore one. Koen v. Bartlett is no help to him. It may occur that, if Jones could not bore, his life estate would be worthless to him. The oil might be drawn off by wells on an adjoining tract. As life tenant, he was entitled to none of it. Such is the quality of that estate.

Having seen that Jones, as life tenant, could not take this oil, we shall next inquire whether his right as owner in fee of three tenths gave him the right to do so. Jones was a tenant in common with the owners of the seven tenths. By the old law one tenant in common was not liable to another for waste, but our Code of 1891 (chap. 92, § 2), has remedied this unreasonable rule by making tenants in common, joint tenants, and parceners liable for waste. 1 Lomax, Dig. 499; 2 Minor, Inst. 620. Then we have simply to inquire whether the extraction of oil is waste, and under authorities above given we must answer that it is. Those acts which would be waste in a tenant for life would be between tenants in common. As the statute uses the law word "waste," we must give it the legal meaning as applied to tenants for life. Elluell v. Burnside, 44 Barb. 447. Chapter 100, § 14, Code 1891, gives an action of account between tenants in common for receiving more than his just share,—that is, more than his just share of rents and profits from the legitimate use of land; but this has no reference to waste. It does not license waste. There stands § 2, chap. 92, branding it as a tort and giving action for it, and it applies though one claim title to the whole, and commit waste. 23 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law, p. 895. As owner of three tenths in fee, Jones could not bore for oil, any more than a stranger, because the act whether done by a cotenant or stranger, is a wrong. For this purpose he was a stranger, so far as the wrongful character of the act is concerned. He had right to possession for residence or other ordinary use working no injury to the inheritance, and therefore we term his act waste, not technically trespass as done by a stranger. "Waste is an injury to the freehold by one who is rightfully in possession. This marks the distinction between waste and a trespass." 1 White & T. Lead. Cas. Eq. 1011. But the nature of the act is a tort in both cases; the same in both. Of course, a stranger would be liable for trespass; or, if he converts the oil from realty into personalty, the injured cotenant may waive the trespass, and go for the value of the oil, or for the money for which the trespasser sold it. Indeed, Jones claimed to own the whole land, repudiated any co-ownership with the Hickman heirs, and thus assigned to himself the position of a stranger. This, however, only strengthens the argument that he is to be regarded a wrongdoer against the owners of the seven tenths, as the statute makes him a wrongdoer, though he were regarded as a tenant in common. It is therefore immaterial to define his exact caste; whether we regard him as a tenant in common or stranger it is the same. If oil wells had been opened, Jones, as cotenant, might set up claim under his three tenths interest to work them, and take all profits under some cases (McCord v. Oakland Quicksilver Min. Co., 64 Cal. 139, 49 Am. Rep. 886), though I should think he would have to account under § 14, chap. 100, Code. Rust v. Rust, 17 W. Va. 901. That would be no wrong; not waste. His life tenancy would give him the right to take all the oil. But there were no oil wells on it, nor any precedent authority to open any. He first pierced the soil in quest of this fluid of fabulous wealth. He had no right to pierce it to get even his three tenths of the oil. If he chose to do so, of every gallon seven tenths belonged to the owners of the seven tenths in the land, because it had been a part of their soil. These considerations repel all idea that as owner of the fee in three tenths he could penetrate the soil, and convert to his sole use, without accounting, all the oil raised. It is true, an expression in a former opinion in this case said that Jones, as owner of three tenths, had right to bore for oil, so he took no more than his share. This is not announced as law in the syllabus. On examination I find no warrant for this expression. The only materiality of this is that it may be claimed to enter into the process of the accounting for the oil, as, if its extraction was lawful, the charge against Jones might be different from what it would be if regarded a wrongdoer. It is, however, sought to be made by counsel a weapon of great potency. Counsel say that this court in the former opinion said that, the act of boring being lawful, and lawfulness of severance gave him who severed it the right to keep the whole, just as the right to use open mines by a life tenant gives him all the product, because he has right to sever. But in this case the severance is unlawful, and the legal deduction fails. Counsel from that expression would say further that when David Hickman, as owner of the seven tenths, gave Mrs. Williamson a life estate, as he must have known as a matter of law that the owners of the other three tenths would have the right to produce oil, he must be understood as contemplating that they might do so, and is to be taken as intending, if they did, that the life tenant should enjoy all the seven tenths of the oil. As the owners of the three tenths had no such right, the argument here again fails. In addition, this would give the life tenant, by mere implication (remote and weak implication at that), a right to what her devise did not carry as an incident,—things a part of the soil, which can only go with it by express grant. It is argued that Hickman, in his devise of a life estate to his favorite daughter, Mrs. Williamson, did not prohibit waste; but as Judge Roard said in Findlay v. Smith, 6 Munf. 148, 8 Am. Dec. 733, exemption from waste cannot result "from the omission, to restrict waste, in the will. That omission became unnecessary, from the limited nature of the estate which was granted. The estate granted was only an estate for life, and it is incident thereto that waste shall not be committed. It would have been a work of supererogation to have inserted such a restriction, and the question may be properly retorted, Why, if it were so intended, was not waste specially permitted by the will? This is not only not done, but the contrary is done, by granting an estate which carries with it the restriction, as an incident. The silence of the will, in this particular, cannot weaken the rights of those in remainder. It cannot destroy rights conferred by the law." At one time, to restrict a life tenant from waste, there must be a restriction in the grant; but now all tenants are forbidden to do waste by statute, unless their grant render them expressly unimpeachable for waste. 2 Minor, Inst. 616, 619; 1 Lomax, Dig. 56; 1 Washb. Real Prop. 107. Of course, when that which is a part of the realty is unlawfully severed, it belongs to him who has the first vested estate of inheritance at the date of severance, as he owns it. University v. Tucker, 81 W. Va. 621; Fearne, Contingent Remainders, 841; Whitfield v. Bewit, 2 P. Wms. 240; 1 Lomax, Dig. 56. The owner of the severed chattel can alone seize it, or bring trover for its conversion, as it came from the inheritance, or claim the thing itself by replevy or detinue, or bring trespass de bonis asportatis for damages for the taking of it, or assumpsit for money had and received from it. "Nor does it matter whether the timber is cut by a stranger or by the tenant [for life] himself, since the tenant cannot convey any interest in it when severed." 1 Washb. Real Prop. 119; 1 Lomax, Dig. 59; Freem. Coten. §§ 297, 302. For the same reason the cotenant doing waste neither owns nor can sell what is not his. "If, however, at the time of the improper working, there is any person in esse entitled either indefeasibly or defeasibly, to an estate of inheritance, the property in the severed chattels, or the amount to be accounted for, will belong absolutely and immediately to such person, or (if more than one) to the first of such persons. And his right of the person so entitled is not affected by the circumstance that between his estate and that of the wrongdoer is interposed in the order of the limitations an estate for life in esse without impeachment of waste." MacSwiney, Mines, chap. 3, § 2d (B), p. 59; 1 Lomax, Dig. 56, 57; Pigot v. Bullock, 1 Ves. Jr. 479; Birch Wolfe v. Birch, L. R. 9 Eq. 683. This shows that Jones, as owner of the life estate intervening before the seventh tenths would be vested in possession could not keep the oil "Oil in the earth belongs to the owner of the land, and when unlawfully taken therefrom by a wrongdoer the title of such owner remains perfect, and he may pursue and reclaim it wherever he may find it." Hughes v. United Pipe Lines, 119 N. Y. 428. It may be said that these doctrines would leave the part owner powerless to get any benefit from the oil. If so, so it must be as a quality of his estate. But it is not so; for if he wished a partition, he was entitled to it, and thus could bore on his separate share, and take the oil on it, and perhaps drain all from the other, and hold it acquit of account for it; and, if he did not wish partition, oil being capable of loss from wells on lands near by, perhaps he could ask a court of equity to allow him to bore, and take his share of the oil, and pay the balance to the remainderman, like that jurisdiction exercised by equity to direct timber in a state of decay to be cut down for the benefit of those entitled to the inheritance, if it would do no damage to the life tenant, compensating him for the use of the land. Here Jones was himself the life tenant. 1 Lomax, Dig. 60; Story, Eq. Jur. § 919. Thus the owners of the seven tenths in the land had plain legal title, and their rights are such as above given to seven tenths of the oil, unless something not yet considered debars them from such rights.

It is urged strenuously, with great elaboration and ability, by counsel, that they are barred by the doctrine of estoppel in pais: that their conduct works this result. Here I first remark that a clear legal title to land, requiring written conveyance to transfer it, is, by this theory, to be divested out of its owners, and invested practically as effectually in others as if such conveyance existed. A clear strong case of estoppel is required for such a result. What is the conduct of these parties bringing about this result? As to Mrs. Williamson, she, having procured the decree of sale, and received its proceeds, is estopped. That is res judicata under our former decision. As to the other devisees of David Hickman, what have they done or left undone to estop them? It is said they ought to have made themselves parties to this suit. There is no force in this. Perhaps they did not want their land sold. There was no ground for the sale of their remainder for the debts of Thomas Jones, deceased, except perhaps one of their seven tenths, as Jones' heirs had conveyed their interest before the suit. If anybody wanted to sell their land for debt, or because partition could not be made, or other cause, he must bring them and their estate before the court. Strange that anyone is to lose his land because he did not cause himself to be sued. Counsel for Jones make their chief point under this head of estoppel by saying: "Because these plaintiffs stood by for eighteen months, and made no claim to the land or oil, knowing that Capt. Jones in good faith, and believing he had a perfect title in fee simple to the farm, was making great expenditures on the land in developing it as oil territory, and had paid $40,000 to buy interests of his copurchasers, Tennant and Haskell, and paid up the preferred instalments of the purchase money for the land, which he would not have done unless he had believed that he had the sole and unquestioned title thereto, the said plaintiffs intending, if Captain Jones succeeded in developing the farm as oil territory, to bring this suit. If he did not succeed, they would let the sale stand without attack, and they would finally take and enjoy the avails and proceeds of the same." By no means does the evidence sustain these predications. Admit, however, these as facts, they do not bar the plaintiffs. First, they do not predicate, nor does any evidence, any contract between the parties, giving Jones a right. The plaintiffs stand in no wise bound to Jones by any contractual relation. Then, to bar them, you must show such conduct as is misconduct amounting to fraud, and this is not shown by these facts, or others in the circumference of the case. Most of the cases cited to support this estoppel are cases in which there was privity or obligation springing from contract, or constructive or other trust. Such are Clarke v. Hart, 6 H. L. Cas. 633; Sumner v. Seaton, 47 N. J. Eq. 119; Gallagher v. Cadwell, 145 U. S. 872, 36 L. ed. 740. There is no contract or trust here. Not the slightest obligation under contract, trust, or fiduciary relation bound these Hickman devisees to Jones. Let us see what is an estoppel by conduct. Let us see whether the defendants can meet its requirements. "An estoppel in pais operates where a person has made an admission or done an act with intent to influence the conduct of another, or that he has reason to believe will influence his conduct, inconsistent with the evidence he proposes now, or with the claim or title he proposes to set up, where the other party has been influenced by and has acted upon it, and where he would be prejudiced by the allowance of the claim or title set up." Judge English in Norfolk & W. R. Co. v. Perdue, 40 W. Va. 454, says that for an estoppel in pais there must be conduct, acts, language, or silence amounting to a representation or concealment of material facts, and the misrepresented or concealed facts known to the party sought to be charged with the estoppel, and unknown to the other party, and the conduct must be with the expectation that it will be acted on, or will likely be; and Judge English further said: "The general rule is that if a person interested in an estate knowingly misleads another into dealing with the estate as if he were not interested, he will be postponed to the party misled, and compelled to make his representation good. It applies to one who denies his own title or encumbrance when inquired of by another who is about to purchase the land, or to loan money upon it as security; to one who knowingly suffers another to deal with the land as though it were his own; to one who knowingly suffers another to expend money in improvements without giving notice of his own claim, and the like. . . . In the language of the most recent decision, to preclude the owner of land from asserting his legal title or interest under such circumstances, there must be shown either actual fraud, or fraud or negligence equivalent to fraud on his part, in concealing his title, or that he was silent when the circumstances would compel an honest man to speak." The plaintiffs never accepted a dollar of the sale of the land under the decree. These plaintiffs were not at the judicial sale, standing by silent, or at the place of improvement; never said a word denying their title; never renounced it; never induced Tennant or Jones to buy or bore; never were inquired of as to their title; never were placed in such circumstances as to call upon them legally, nor perhaps even morally, to speak out. All they are guilty of is silence, quiescence. They did not, it is true, seek Jones, and warn him. This is their offense, in length and breadth. Under the doctrine of estoppel above given, this is not enough. 1 Bigelow, Fr. 590, says: "Having now considered the subject of deception by act, on all sides, we are next brought to the subject of deception by omission; in other words, to the case of silence where there was a duty to speak. Now silence alone, it may be declared as a general rule, is not unlawful in transactions between men at arm's length, however great the advantage gained thereby; a man's unpublished thought is surely his own. But it must be understood at the outset that by silence we mean entire silence as distinguished from that sort which merely keeps back part of a truth told or suggested. . . . But speaking of pure silence, the general rule stated is very strong. It governs, even though the silence was meditated, and with knowledge that the opposite party was laboring under mistake or ignorance." These people were not bound to volunteer to warn Jones, and we can the more excuse them for silence and inaction—all they are guilty of—when we reflect that, if they knew anything about the title's condition, they knew Capt. Jones held the life estate, and they would have no right to possession until its end, which exculpates them from any animadversion for intentional wrong.

Again, it is not clear they knew their title, especially as some—nearly all—were infants and married women. If a business man like the defendant could not judge correctly of his title, could they? Moreover, I say that if one man chooses to go upon another's land, and clear and improve it, the mere failure of the owner to go to him and warn him not to do so will not take away the true owner's title. He is given the time fixed by the statute of limitations, though he do know that his adversary is expending money in improvements. He may every week pass along and see the work. Mere silence will not rob him of title until time does the work under the statute. Unless there is a duty to speak out, one need not. "To create a duty to speak, it must be known by the one keeping silence that someone is relying on that silence, and is either acting or is about to act as he would not have done had the truth been told." Viele v. Judson, 82 N. Y. 40. There is no proof that these parties knew Jones was relying on them or their silence, and in fact he shows himself he did not. But I say the test just put in the New York case is not strong enough. Mere silence and knowledge that another is relying on it is not enough. He must be brought into such close quarters or situation towards him as to call on him to speak out. Again, a potent fact against Jones on this estoppel is that before Tennant, who, as his agent, bought at the judicial sale, Jones knew of the defect of the title.

1. The record in the cases stated that Thomas Jones died leaving ten heirs; and the petition of Engle and Williamson, on which the sale of the whole tract was first based, stated that Eliza Williamson only owned a life estate in seven tenths. Who owned the remainders? The very decree of sale declares: "It appearing to the court that the interests held by C. Engle as trustee as aforesaid are for the use and benefit for life of Eliza Williamson by virtue of a provision in the will and codicil of said David Hickman." Who owned the remainder? This record put this question to a purchaser. Prudence would make a man inquire where the real estate in the land was. A purchaser at a court sale purchases under the rule of caveat emptor (look out buyer). The court or commissioner warrants nothing. One buying at such a sale is held—conclusively held—to have notice of all the facts which the record, if inspected, would communicate. Stout v. Philippi Mfg. & Mercantile Co. 41 W. Va. 239; Pom. Eq. Jur. § 626; Wood v. Krebs, 30 Gratt. 708; Burwell v. Fauber, 21 Gratt. 448. Where one claimed for improvements, such record notice was held enough to debar him as showing that he did not improve with bona fide belief that his title was good. Hall v. Hall, 30 W. Va. 785. Jones had actual notice of this defect of title, and of the fact that the plaintiffs owned of the seven tenths as the remainder. He, as a witness, says his agent, Tennant, to procure oil leases, reported to him that a lease of this land from Mrs. Williamson would not be safe, "as she only owned part in fee and a life interest in the balance," and the only way was to buy it. This knowledge defeats his plea of estoppel under cases cited above, and Beltman v. Harness, 42 W. Va. 483, 38 L. R. A. 566, and Dawson v. Grou, 29 W. Va. 383. A small modicum of prudence would have saved him. He heeded not this warning, but venturesomely risks a purchase, and the expenditure of his money. He was not moved by any words or act or representation of the plaintiffs, nor by their silence, but hazarded his action in the spirit of speculation, not relying on their silence, but his own judgment. Jones says he claimed the whole, and would not have heeded the claim of the plaintiffs, if they had made it. It would not have stopped this expenditure. How can he lay his misfortune at their door? His counsel argue that the commissioner who sold told him it was a good title. Jones says he did not say he did so until July, 1893, and he had then bored all but two or three wells. But, what if he did? Are these plaintiffs responsible, even if the lawyer told him that it was not necessary to make the remaindermen parties? This mistake, in legal opinion, does not bind the plaintiffs. He was not their lawyer. He had no authority, as commissioner, to bind them, or guarantee title, and they were not parties to the suit even. It is argued that the sale was made under decree with the knowledge and desire of the remaindermen, and this position is sought to be supported on circumstances entirely inadequate to sustain this contention. The judge who rendered the sale decree was father to children of one of the remaindermen, the commissioner was husband to another, and a son of David Hickman performed the clerical work of recording the decree; and the remaindermen must therefore have known of,

and been satisfied with, the decree, say counsel. This does not follow. Suppose they did know it, and were satisfied. If they did nothing active, it is not enough. One with legal title to land cannot, by oral disclaimer of right, even the most expressed, divest himself of legal right. Cline v. Catron, 22 Gratt. 878; Jackson, Van Schaick, v. Davis, 5 Cow. 128, 15 Am. Dec. 451.

Counsel would explain why these remaindermen were not made parties, saying the lawyer in the case thought, as Jones' heirs were parties, and Mrs. Williamson owner of a life estate in seven tenths and three tenths in fee, they were not necessary parties, as Hickman purchased shares of Jones' heirs after his death, and they were liable to his debts. They were not liable, except one of the seven tenths; and anyhow they owned legal title to the remainder in fee, and were absolutely necessary parties, and neither they nor their estate were before the court, and their estate was not sold under the decree, and it was a nullity as to the remaindermen. No matter who made the mistake in the conduct of the suit, or how it came about, it could not prejudice these remaindermen. They can be bound only by record, not by mere supposition, or even proof, that they knew or approved of it. The decree and deed under it conveyed no title. Mrs. Williamson, though before the court, was only life tenant of the seven tenths, and there is no privity between life tenants and remaindermen, so that the presence of a life tenant as a party by representation makes the remainderman a party. "A stranger, who is not a party or a privy, can neither be barred nor aided" by a judgment or decree. Barton, Ch. Pr. 213; 2 Pom. Eq. Jur. § 818. Engle was a dry trustee; the real owners of the remainder were the remaindermen. The trustee could not represent their interest. Even a creditor under a deed of trust, not merely a trustee, must be a party; much more the remainderman in a case of dry trusteeship, where it is proposed to sell the very corpus or fee of the land, and all rights whatsoever therein. It is essential that there be before the court, not merely the owner of particular estate, but also the owner of the first vested estate in reversion or remainder, and this was in these remaindermen. 1 Dan. Ch. Pr. 227, 228; Story, Eq. Pl. §§ 144, 145; Opinion, Faulkner v. Davis, 18 Gratt. 684, 98 Am. Dec. 698. The trustee and life tenant not representing the remaindermen, and they being necessary parties to bring the fee of the land before the court, they are not bound by the sale. But this was decided on the former decision. Counsel ask, why, if the plaintiffs did not acquiesce in the sale, did they not adduce evidence to show that they did not? The burden to show acquiescence is on the defendant asserting it. Mere acquiescence, if proved, would not divest their title. If these parties knew of the sale and boring, which is only by mere inference, there is evidence tending to show that they thought it was only Mrs. Williamson's interest that was sold, as she is shown to have been anxious to get rid of the land. It is not clear that they knew of it; but, what if they did? Can their land be taken from them merely for that? So I conclude that estoppel in pais will not defeat the plain, legal right of the plaintiffs. But, as some of them were infants and married women, even if there were facts to show such estoppel as is here contended for, it would not bind the married women or infants. They would not be guilty of such a fraud as would estop them. The title of these plaintiffs vested before April 1, 1869, and therefore the interests of the married women were not separate estate. A distinction is made in a brief between land that is separate estate and that not separate estate, the theory being that as to separate estate the married woman may lose it by estoppel in pais, whereas she cannot so lose land not separate estate; but, as under our statute her sole deed is void in both cases, and she could only pass either class of land by a deed with privy examination (when this transaction occurred), and now by acknowledgments, her husband joining, I do not see where any distinction comes in. Whether a married woman, by positive, intentional fraud, can lose her land, when her sole deed will not divest her of it, the authorities are divided. I should say that, as the law scrupulously limits her power of alienation to one only mode, she could not do so; that she could not do indirectly what she could not do directly by a solemn deed, because it is the policy and positive provision of statute that she shall be disabled by an act of hers to part with her land except in one way. Bigelow, Estoppel, 599; Bishop, Married Women, § 488; 2 Herman, Estoppel, § 1102. Note that I am speaking of her losing her land, not personality, for I think she may thus lose her personality, as she is competent to sell that. But in this case no affirmative act of fraudulent representation is shown; only silence. If I be right in the position that actual fraudulent representation would not lose her right, for stronger reason mere silence would not; but, even if positive, affirmative fraud would lose her land, mere silence would not. 14 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law, p. 643, says that, as "such estoppels as arise out of a failure to assert a right, or out of silence and acquiescence in the right claimed by others, arise only because from such silence and acquiescence a representation is implied, it is clear that a married woman can be bound by her silence and acquiescence only in cases when she would have been bound had she expressly made the statement which is implied. Thus, when a married woman makes an invalid deed she is not estopped by afterwards recognizing its validity and allowing the grantee to improve the property, from asserting her title, for she would not be estopped therefrom by expressly telling the grantee that she would never claim any title thereto; but if she could contract as a feme sole, and allowed her grantee to improve property on the faith of a title given him by her, she could not deny the validity of that title." It is cautious to observe that the law books say that, in order that a fraud by a married woman shall constitute an estoppel against her, it must be unconnected with a contract, because, as her contract would be void, her mere conduct connected with it would not operate to enforce it; but that was when she was disabled from contracting; and, now that our statute has fully enabled her to contract, I think that any fraudulent act which would es-top her when not connected with a contract would also do so though connected with a contract. This limitation proceeded from her disability, and, that having been removed, the limitation would be removed. Bishop, Married Women, § 493; 1 Pom. Eq. Jur. § 418; Tufts v. Copen, 37 W. Va. 629. But observe, further, that as to selling and conveying her land she remains under limited disability. Wherefore I am clearly of opinion that the mere silence or inaction of the married women—their quiescence, for it is not acquiescence—does not bar them.

How as to infants? Positive intentional fraud would bar an infant of years of discretion, but mere silence or quiescence surely will not. I think the weight of authority is that matter sufficient to raise an estoppel, if unconnected with a contract, would bar an infant from asserting a right even to land. It must, however, be intentionally fraudulent. Mere silence or quiescence, as in this case, will not do so. Bigelow, Estoppel, 600; 2 Pom. Eq. Jur. § 815. The deed of a married woman is void; an infant's only voidable,—a difference.

I have discussed the question whether or not the plaintiffs are barred by the doctrine of estoppel in pais as an open question unaffected by the former decision, though it may be said plausibly that it did decide against that defense, in deciding that Jones must account on some basis. If a good bar, he would not have to account, and the court would have dismissed the bill. That decision did not decide finally that Jones rightfully bored for oil. It did not decide how much Jones should be charged nor on what basis. That decision was, in terms, in these matters, not final, but provisional.

There cannot possibly be anything in the contention that laches bars relief. The delay from the judicial sale was only eighteen months; from the commencement of boring, some less. The statute of limitations gives ten years. The many cases of laches cited are cases of deeds of other things procured by fraud, as in Whittaker v. Southwest Virginia Improv. Co. 34 W. Va. 280, where there must be promptness. Here is no such case, but simply one in adverse claim of another's land, or ouster by one tenant in common, or a suit to make Jones account for oil taken from the land; the statute giving five years. Why, in such case, plead laches short of the period fixed by statute? Viewed as a suit to recover possession,—but it is not,—time would not begin until the end of the life estate. Merritt v. Hughes, 36 W. Va. 357; Arnold v. Bunwell, 42 W. Va. 478. Time has no weight in any view in this case.

Having reached the conclusion that the plaintiffs have right to relief, the next question is as to what shall be charged to Jones, or the mode of account. It is not questioned, but may be stated as law pertinent to the case, that though action as law in case for waste, or trover, or trespass de bonis, or perhaps pure trespass, would lie, yet equity can take the account. It has indubitable jurisdiction for an injunction to restrain the waste. Bettman v. Harness, 42 W. Va. 438, 36 L. R. A. 566; Williamson v. Jones, 39 W. Va. 281, 25 L. R. A. 222. Having jurisdiction for one purpose, it will go 38 L. R. A.

on to do complete justice to avoid multiplicity of suits. Christip v. Teter, 43 W. Va. —, 27 W. Va. 288. And with respect to a suit of this particular cast to enjoin waste, it is clear equity will take an account and give compensation for damages. Story, Eq. Jur. § 517; 1 Washb. Real Prop. 126. As above stated, Jones had no right to any of the oil as life tenant. As owner of the three tenths of the land, he had no right to produce the oil, and his act in so doing was one of waste. When he did extract the oil, seven tenths of it was by right and title oil of the plaintiffs, the very oil itself, because taken from their land. Jones converted this, their property, to his own use. They are entitled to recover the money he received for it, if ascertainable; if not, its value. It is urged that in a former opinion it is said that Jones had right to bore, so he did not take more than his share of the oil. Would not that leave the balance the property of the plaintiffs? I do not see that this expression that he had right to bore is material, unless it show, as counsel seeks to use it, that, having the right to bore, Jones had the right to keep all the oil; but that the opinion in words denies. The plaintiffs owned seven tenths of the oil when it reached the surface. It has been converted to his own use by Jones. His claiming all the land would be an ouster. He took the oil under adverse hostile claim, as an act of trespass. Indeed, the plaintiffs can treat it as an ouster. It is not a question of rent in the shape of royalty of one eighth of the oil or otherwise, for royalty is rent, and springs from contract; and there was nothing contractual between these parties. If a stranger had bored, could the plaintiffs not render him liable for the conversion of their oil? Jones is as a stranger, a hostile claimant shutting them out; and even if he had not claimed the whole land, but acknowledged their right to part of the land, the taking of the oil was waste, and gave him no right to their share. The former opinion says this.

It is claimed for Jones, if he is not allowed all the oil, he should pay only one eighth of the seven eighths as royalty. If he had worked already opened wells, it might be more plausible to say so; but he first penetrated the soil as a wrongdoer, in a legal view. If an open well, it would be lawfully used by a life tenant, and probably by a tenant in common, as one mode of enjoyment of his share. I say probably. That matter is not before us. Rust v. Rust, 17 W. Va. 901, holds that where one tenant in common occupies the whole property he is liable to cotenants for a reasonable rent for it in the condition it was in when he took possession. This is approved in the opinion in Dodson v. Hays, 29 W. Va. 601. This doctrine follows Early v. Friend, 16 Gratt. 21, 78 Am. Dec. 649. In the two West Virginia cases the use of the land was for ordinary purposes, not extracting minerals, and the occupying tenant had right to occupy and farm the land. The Early Case was the use of a salt well opened before the commencement of the cotenancy and perhaps the use of the salt water in making salt by the occupying tenant was lawful, as the use of the land in the condition it was in when he went upon it, and as it had been used by the ancestor. And besides, between him and some of the co-owners, there was a stipulated rent, which the judge gives as a reason for the charge of a rent; and besides he says the occupying cotenant and the others regarded it as a renting. And the court refrained from laying this down as an inexorable rule, saying there might be cases calling for an account of rents and profits. The case in hand is a case of a different hue; not the case of one cropping the land in that legitimate use which a tenant in common may make of the land; not use of open salt or oil well, which likely can be used by one tenant as it had been before; but when one pierces the earth, and takes from its place oil that is a part of the realty,—an act not of legitimate use, but destruction and waste of the inheritance of the others. Almost an exactly similar case to the one in hand is Ruffner v. Lewis, 7 Leigh, 720, 30 Am. Dec. 513, where persons claiming adversely to plaintiffs were held tenants in common with them, and had sole occupation, and had discovered salt, and bored wells. Great controversy arose as to the mode of charge against them. Held chargeable, not with rental, but rents and profits, if any made, with credit for expenses and improvements. Graham v. Pierce, 19 Gratt. 28, 100 Am. Dec. 658, is like unto this case. It was a case of lead mines, where parties jointly operated them for a time, and one continues to use the open mines. President Moncure said: "The court is further of opinion that although, as a general rule, where one tenant in common occupies and uses the common property to the exclusion of his cotenants, or occupies and uses more of the common property than his just share or proportion, the best measure of his accountability to his cotenants may be their shares or proportions of a fair rent of the property so occupied and used by him, according to the principle laid down in the case of Early v. Friend, 16 Gratt. 21, 52, 78 Am. Dec. 649; yet, as was said in that case 'there may be peculiar circumstances in a case making it proper to resort to an account of issues, profits, etc., as a mode of adjustment between the tenants in common.' Id. 54; Buffner v. Lewis, 7 Leigh, 720, 30 Am. Dec. 513. Under the circumstances of this case it was proper to resort to an account of issues, profits, etc., as a mode of adjustment between the tenants in common. It is not a case of land used for agricultural purposes only, in which there is no difficulty in ascertaining a fair rent for use and occupation; nor is it such a case as that of Early v. Friend, where the property consisted of salt works, the yearly value of which might be ascertained with reasonable certainty, and where a money rent had been contracted for and paid to some of the tenants in common, which furnished a standard for ascertaining the amount due to others; but in the case of a lead mine, the yearly value of which, and more especially of an undivided and uncertain portion of which, is incapable of ascertainment. Nor would it be just, in settling the account of issues and profits to charge the occupying and operating tenants with a certain sum per ton for the quantity of ore raised from the mine, nor to credit them with an estimated sum per ton for raising the ore and manufacturing the lead, as contended for by the appellants. Such a mode would be founded on conjecture merely, and would be very unequal and unjust, as it could not be known what would be the cost of raising ore, which would depend upon its situation in the mine, its degree of richness, and the facility or difficulty of getting at it, as well as upon the uncertain price of labor; nor what would be the cost of manufacturing lead, which would depend upon the varying price of labor and supplies. The best mode of settling such an account and one which is perfectly just, supposing the tenant to have been capable and faithful, is to charge him with all his receipts, and credit him with all his expenses, on account of the operation of the mine." If the difference in the nature of a lead mine and a salt works was such as to require in the case of the former an account of rents and profits, with how much more force are we driven to the conclusion that in a property such as that in the case at bar, consisting of oil wells, the yearly value of which was still more uncertain and difficult of ascertainment, in which the cost of operation is still more uncertain than that of the lead mine, the account must be taken as one of rents and profits. In Newman v. Newman, 27 Gratt. 722, the court had to determine the basis of an account between cotenants of an iron mine. On pages 723 and 728, President Moncure refers to the cases of Graham v. Pierce and Early v. Friend, and quotes from Graham v. Pierce the distinctions between the two cases there stated. The opinion says: "That was the case of a lead mine, while this is the case of a iron mine, and there seems to be no difference in principle between them on the subject we are now considering. A tenant of such property necessarily uses a part of the subject itself, and may by such uses render the residue of the subject of little or no value. It may be discovered by explorations and operations that the property is of great value, or the contrary. To rent it for a certain sum is to make a bargain of speculation and hazard, which is always objectionable in such cases as it is almost sure to operate unequally on the parties. Whereas to carry on operations upon it for the joint and equal benefit of all the owners in proportion to their respective interests in the subject, and by the agency of persons (whether they have an interest therein or not) who may be amply compensated for their trouble, complete justice will be done to all parties concerned. It may be said that to carry on the business required a capital, which one of the parties did not have. But that matter may be adjusted by allowing interest to the party who advances the capital. In this case the property was of known and established value, and there would probably have been no difficulty in finding a suitable agent and borrowing the necessary capital to carry on the operations, even if both had not been readily furnished by one of the parties." As counsel say: "Here are pointed out other facts which are also found in the case at bar and which, it seems to me, are controlling, and require the application to this case of the rule in Graham v. Pierce. Those facts are that the development of oil property necessarily uses part of the subject itself more rapidly and completely than in the case of a lead mine, and renders the residue of the subject of no value whatever. It is even more true of an oil well than a lead mine that explorations and operations may show that it is of great value, or the contrary. The speculation and hazard are more in the case of an oil well than in that of a lead mine. Indeed, all that is said by President Moncure in Newman v. Newman, as quoted above, is applicable with added force in the case at bar. In both the Virginia cases in which a rent was charged (actually in one, nominally in the other) the property consisted of open mines, and the parties interested had theretofore settled accounts on the basis of a rent. Neither of those facts exists here, where the wells were not open; no rent had theretofore been charged, and the inheritance itself was being taken."

In Dodge v. Davis, 85 Iowa, 77, an instruction was held proper (pp. 81, 82, 85 Iowa) that a tenant in common was entitled to recover from a defendant cotenant, who had ousted him, claiming exclusive right to use the land, in addition to a fair rent for the use of the premises, his share of the fair market value of the trees or timber, if any, that defendant sold to third parties off of said land. In Huff v. McDonald, 23 Ga. 131, 68 Am. Dec. 487, relating to a gold mine, it was held: "A tenant in common, who receives more than his share of the profits of the common property, holds the surplus as bailiff for his cotenant, who, therefore, stands to him as principal. He, consequently, is bound to pay his cotenant the actual profits which he has made out of such surplus, as well as the surplus itself." In Hayden v. Merrill, 44 Vt. 336, 8 Am. Dec. 372, the defendant cotenant was held liable for profits, and not for rent. In Shepard v. Richards, 2 Gray, 424, 61 Am. Dec. 473, the inquiry was to the profits received, not the rents due. In Pearson v. Carlton, 18 S. C. 47, an account for rents and profits (p. 49) was held proper (pp. 53, 54). This was a case where land was sold under decree where an heir was not a party, and he was given partition and rents and profits. That case refers to Jones v. Massey, 14 S. C. 292, which held that the accounting should be of rents and profits, and not of rental value. Such was the accounting in Dewing v. Dewing, 165 Mass. 230. In Winton Coal Co. v. Pinecast Coal Co. 170 Pa. 442, the court, after construing the statute of Anne, says: "Where the cotenant has actually received the rent of the common property, or has converted coal, timber, oil, gas, or minerals—part thereof—into cash, and retains a share thereof which actually belongs to his co-owner, there would seem to be no good reason why, in a proper case, he may not be sued in assumpsit for his cotenant's share thereof." See also Riquet v. Allison, 12 Mich. 328, 86 Am. Dec. 54; Loomis v. O'Neil, 73 Mich. 552; Tuttle v. Campbell, 74 Mich. 602. In Job v. Pottou, L. R. 20 Eq. 84, the court regarded the defendant cotenant as having been in all respects blameless, not a wilful wrongdoer against whom the accounts would be taken rigorously, not negligent or tortious; so that while he would be allowed for bringing the coal to the pit's mouth, but not for the expense of severance, but as having produced the coal in the exercise of a strict right (p. 97), and decreed an account against the defendant for the value at the pit's mouth of the coal raised, less the cost of getting and raising it. The idea that he should be dismissed on payment of a rent does not seem to have occurred to anyone.

It does seem to me on authority and reason that an account of rents and profits is the true basis. I cannot see how, where there is no lease, no contract, no tacit understanding between the parties, no past mode of business, but one not the true owner has used and received rents and profits from land of other people, you can charge an annual rental, and not their fraction of rents and profits received by the occupier. What is to be done with the money to which the plaintiffs are entitled? Does it go to them at once, or is it to be put at interest, and Jones, as life tenant, get the interest on it, during Eliza Williamson's life, or a certain sum for its present worth?

As above shown, by reference to MacSwiney on Mines, it goes at once to the plaintiffs, and Jones has no right to interest on it during the life estate: (1) Because he is, in a legal point of view, a wrongdoer, and, if given interest, this would give him the benefit of his own wrong. In Williams v. Duke Bolton, 1 Cox, Ch. Cas. 72, cited in 3 P. Wms. 268, a tenant for life committing waste, who owed the next existent estate of inheritance, subject to an intermediate contingent remainder, was not allowed to take advantage of his own wrong in cutting timber, but the fund was kept for the contingent remaindermen, and he was made to pay interest on it from the time the money for the timber was received. There are instances where the reversioner or remainderman, during a life estate in another, wrongfully severs minerals, the proceeds are invested, and the income paid to the life tenant during life, though the minerals really belonged to the wrongdoer, because he could not take advantage of his wrong against the tenant. MacSwiney, Mines, 66. This is doubtful but shows how far courts go against one doing the unlawful act.

2. Jones is not entitled to interest, because he did not own a drop of the oil belonging to the owners of the seven tenths. He is not entitled to the oil, and, of course, is not entitled to the income of interest from its proceeds. The decree gave the collateral heirs of Dr. Weirich, husband of Laura Weirich, shares in the amount charged to Jones for the oil. I think this was error. Laura Weirich was a child of David Hickman, outliving her father, dying childless, leaving her husband, to whom by her will she gave all her interest in the estate of her father, "both as legatee and residuary distributee under his last will." The will of her father gave her a legacy of $600 and some silverware. By clause 14 he provided that his real estate not before disposed of (and this land had been given to Mrs. Williamson for life with remainder to her sisters) be sold, and out of it and his personalty his debts paid and the bequest be made, and the residue divided equally among his daughters, among them Laura Weirich. The will of Laura Weirich would give her husband her legacy of $600 and the silverware, and her share in the residue arising from the sale of land and personalty, as the words, "both as legatee and residuary distributee," would in their legal import imply. They are subjects fitting those words in their legal meaning. She gave, too, "subject to certain devises and bequests hereinafter to be made," but made bequests,—no devises,—but used improperly the word "devise" in making bequests, tending to show still further that she had her mind on personalty, not realty. Her will gave nothing in this land. Hence her husband got no interest in this land, and she died intestate as to it; and as she died before the Code of 1868, and under the reign of clause 3, § 1, chap. 123, Code 1860, it would go to her sisters, the plaintiffs, not to the husband, under § 1, cl. 2, chap. 78, Code 1868. And besides, she died under Code 1860, and chapter 122, § 3, allowed a married woman to make will only of her separate estate; and this was not separate estate, because it vested in her before our first separate estate act (Code 1868, chap. 66).

As to the alleged error in not decreeing that the purchase money under the judicial sale, paid by the purchaser, be refunded to the purchaser, that was not cognizable in this case, but by some proceeding or step in the case in which the sale was had, or other independent proceeding, whatever it may be.

This decision may be burdensome to Jones, who appears to be a man of great energy, business capacity, and merit, and I will not conceal the wish that we could, consistently with law, be more favorable to him; but we are bound by the law, seemingly very plain, and in itself logical and well established. The plain and simple showing of the voluminous record and contestation in this case is that he has taken sole and exclusive possession of land belonging in greater fraction to others, and of his own accord drawn from it vast quantities of oil belonging to them in clear law, and sold it, and reaped rich return, and the true owners demand their own under the law. If he was mistaken in his own judgment as to the title, or from misadvice, it is a misfortune that is to be regretted, but for which the plaintiffs are not legally responsible; and if he knew of the defect of title, and he surely had enough to warn him and put him upon inquiry before embarking in large expenditures, it seems only rashness, or rash speculation. In fact, however, the returns bored the wells after the first.

I have said so much only in consideration of the pecuniary magnitude of the case, and in deference to the elaboration, in the oral arguments and briefs of distinguished counsel, of the points involved in the case, which do not seem to me to be very difficult of solution up to this point. As stated above, the charge against Jones is to be by rents and profits, not by annual rentals; but this presents a question which has given me great perplexity, and this is the question, What shall be credited to Jones against rents and profits?—especially whether he shall be repaid expense of boring wells. Where one man, in possession under a hostile defective claim or title, makes permanent improvements, the common law gave him no pay for them, as he voluntarily put them upon the land of another; but our Code (chap. 91) gives compensation therefor if, when the improvements are made, there is "reason to believe the title good under which he or they were holding." As shown above, warning was given Jones by Tennant, his agent, and by the record under which he purchased, of the rights of the plaintiffs, and our court has held that this notice precludes allowance for improvements. Hall v. Hall, 30 W. Va. 779; Dawson v. Gros, 29 W. Va. 333; Cain v. Cox, 29 W. Va. 258; Id., 28 W. Va. 613. Good faith would seem to be the test, but these cases affect Jones, legally speaking, with a notice repelling good faith; and yet there is good ground for saying that, as a matter of fact, Jones, from misadvice as to the law, thought he was buying a good title. People generally think that a court sale always gives good title, whereas often it does not. Therefore, viewing Jones as an adverse claimant, or as one who, being really a tenant in common, yet takes sole possession, denying the claim of all others and claiming the entirety, and taking exclusively all rents and profits, it is difficult to accord him compensation consistently with dry law. Even where one joint tenant or tenant in common, not claiming the whole,—not denying his fellow's right,—makes permanent improvements, without his fellow's consent, he cannot charge him, nor hold exclusive possession until reimbursed by rents and profits. Ward v. Ward, 40 W. Va. 611, 29 L. R. A. 449; Freem. Coten, § 263. In Crest v. Jack, 3 Watts, 238, 37 Am. Dec. 353, and note, it was held that "a joint tenant or tenant in common may not erect buildings or make improvements on the common property without the consent of his cotenant, and then claim to hold until reimbursed a proportion of the moneys expended. . . . Nor will it alter the case that the cotenant knew that the buildings were being erected, and made no objection." The opinion there says: "There are, however, cases in which an owner of land standing by and permitting another to expend his money in improving it, has, in equity, been deemed a delinquent, and been compelled to surrender his right on receiving compensation, or else to pay for the improvement. But in these cases there is always some ingredient which would make it a fraud in the owner of the land to insist on his legal right. There is something like encouragement to the other's going on; or the one party acts ignorantly and without the means of better information, and the other remains silent when it is in his power to prevent him from expending his money under a delusion. To permit such a one to take advantage of the mistake would be revolting to every sentiment of justice. But, on the other hand, I know no case where equity has, on the mere ground of silence, relieved one who is perfectly acquainted with his rights, or has the means of becoming so, and yet wilfully undertakes to proceed in expending money on the land of another without obtaining or asking his consent. His ignorance, if it exists, is wilful, and he acts at his peril. . . . In the case before us there is no evidence that the plaintiff in any respect encouraged or connived at the erection of these buildings by T. Blair. Nor was the plaintiff bound to notify Blair of his right in the land, or of his dissent to the erection of the buildings. Blair was well acquainted with the titles of the respective parties, . . . and if he was not, he was bound to inquire into the title before he undertook to appropriate the lot. It was a matter of record, accessible to all."

It is difficult to ignore the force of that argumentation in this case. In fact, if we turn to the case of Foster v. Weaver, 118 Pa. 42, and the principles stated in it, we could, with some plausibility, deny any cost of production at all. That case held that one tenant in common, tortiously deprived by fraud of his cotenant of his interest in an oil lease, is entitled, in a suit brought for his share of the oil produced and converted by the cotenant, to recover as damages the value of the oil in the tank without deducting for expenses of production. The test there made as to such allowance is whether the party acted under honest mistake of good right, or otherwise; and seeing that our cases of Hall v. Hall, 80 W. Va. 779, and Dawson v. Grow, 29 W. Va. 833, upon the record of the case in which Jones purchased, and other circumstances, would affect him with notice and deny him improvements, I repeat that there would be plausibility for denying any cost of production. The thought occurred to me that the record charged Jones with only constructive notice, not actual notice, and that perhaps actual notice was necessary; but Hall v. Hall, Dawson v. Grow, and Cain v. Cor, 29 W. Va. 258, and 23 W. Va. 618, reject this thought, also 10 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law, p. 247. Effinger v. Hall, 81 Va. 94, holds constructive notice tantamount to actual notice, but holds that purchasers at judicial sales may well presume everything rightly done, but that purchasers in pais must examine the chain of title. This exception as to judicial sales I doubt. Our case of Hall v. Hall, 80 W. Va. 779, is contra. The very record of the case in which the sale was made and Hickman's will spoke the rights of plaintiffs. If a man's deed tells him of another's right, why may we not say so when the record giving him title tells him of it? To say otherwise is to say that a purchaser at a court sale may shut his eyes to the contents of the record, which would notify him of another's right, make improvements, and then take away that other's rights, though by the sale he derived no title to such other's rights; the suit thus operating to do indirectly what it does not do directly. If Jones, by mistake of law, was led to believe that the court sale conferred good title, that will not serve him. Opinion in Hall v. Hall, 80 W. Va. 785; Harper v. Price, 17 W. Va. 523; 10 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law, p. 248, note.

But there are other considerations. We are in a court of equity, which often departs from dry legal rules in the interest of substantial, even-handed justice. It does not seem that there is any inflexible, iron-clad rule in equity in this matter, unless our statute imposes it. This is not the case of a suit to impose upon the co-owner a personal liability, or a liability on his land, for improvements, nor to continue in possession till future profits shall reimburse them; but it is a case where the plaintiffs ask an account to charge Jones with rents and profits, and he seeks to set off improvements. Yea, more, it is a case where the plaintiffs ask to receive the benefit of the property in its improved condition,—to have the benefit of those improvements; that is, they ask pay for oil flowing through these very wells, without which wells there would not be a gallon of oil for them or for Jones. The law is well settled that in account of rents and profits you must charge the party for the property in its condition before his improvements, and not with the profits of his improvements (page 789, 80 W. Va.; Freem. Coten. § 262; Code, chap. 91, § 2; Moore v. Ligon, 80 W. Va. 155; White v. Stuart, 76 Va. 566; Early v. Friend, 16 Gratt. 21, 78 Am. Dec. 649; Fishack v. Ball, 34 W. Va. 644). This is a strong factor in the solution of this question. The plaintiffs demand their oil, solely the fruit of the pluck and courage and energy of Jones, in hazardous enterprises, which might have involved him in ruin. They came into a court of equity, asking that we accord them their legal rights, and they are given unto them, but it is an adage there that he who asks equity must himself do equity. He cannot, in every instance, eat the fruitage without sharing in the burden of the plaintiff. I repeat that no immovable rule binds a court of equity in this matter. Freeman's Cotenancy & Partition (§ 279) says: "Improvements made by one cotenant independent of any agreement so to do, may sometimes be proper matter to be considered in taking an account but, under what circumstances and to what extent, improvements may be considered in taking an account between cotenants, cannot be stated with desirable precision. It is probable, however, that they will not be made a subject of compensation, unless they are of a usual character and are necessary for the ordinary and economical use of the property." There is a difference between the case where the party making improvements seeks, as an actor or plaintiff, to set up a debt against the co-owner or his land for improvements, and one where the co-owner calls on the other to account for rents and profits; for in the former case, generally, the party will fail, and in the latter, if the party has acted in good faith, he will be allowed to set off improvements. See opinion in Effinger v. Hall, 81 Va. 103; 8 Pom. Eq. Jur. § 1241. There is some authority that where one has in good faith put improvements on land he may, by a suit of his own, charge the land. Bright v. Boyd, 1 Story, 478. But unless there was an agreement or circumstances tantamount, or fraud, I would doubt this. Clearly, a consent to such improvement binds the party, and creates a lien on the land and a personal obligation. Houston v. McCluney, 8 W. Va. 185. (It is proper to remark that defendants claiming improvements under chapter 91, Code, may recover beyond rents and profits, if in good faith claimants.) I repeat that this suit is to charge Jones with rents and profits, and it is not inconsistent to allow him as a set-off expenses of production, including, not merely handling the oil, but the cost of boring productive wells, under the particular circumstances of the case, namely, that by reason of the energy and risk of Jones he developed this hitherto worthless land into an oil field of almost amazing wealth, yielding far beyond the cost of development, and leaving to go to the plaintiffs large returns. If we give Jones his expenditures, still a larger amount goes to the plaintiffs; otherwise Jones loses them, and this would violate a rule of equity which, translated from the Latin, says that "by the natural law it is not right that anyone should grow rich by the detriment and injury of another." Much authority can be shown to support this doctrine in addition to that given above. Story, Eq. Jur. § 1236, note; Corcoran v. Corcoran, 119 Ind. 138, 4 L. R. A. 742; Stewart v. Stewart, 90 Wis. 516; 11 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law, p. 1107. But for Jones, acts, this oil would not have been produced, so far as we can see; but for him perhaps this oil now enriching the plaintiffs would have been lost to them by being drained off by wells on adjoining lands. Under these circumstances, equity cannot be blind to the argument that Jones' acts have been to the plaintiffs a blessing, not even in disguise, but plain and apparent. We cannot be deaf to the argument that the labor, enterprise, and business ability of this man, though technically in the wrong, appeal to a court of equity with strong call for liberality so far as to repay him by set off all outlay in producing oil, including cost of productive wells, and we resolve any doubt by so holding. A debt for such improvement could not be made against the plaintiffs, nor would we say that all their oil could be thus absorbed; but here is a large surplus.

In conclusion I must not omit to say that our holding in allowing costs of wells is fortified by the precedent of Ruffner v. Lewis, 7 Leigh, 720, 30 Am. Dec. 513, where parties holding adversely to the plaintiff were treated as tenants in common with them, and as they had bored wells, and discovered and produced salt water, were allowed improvements, including cost of wells, as set-offs against rents and profits, and even for abortive wells, the court saying: "The plaintiffs, if they will have advantage from their successes, must be content to share in their disappointments and failures. He who takes the profit must share the burden." True, in that case, the court found that the parties acted under fair belief of good title, so that their good faith could not be doubted. Here, under cases above cited, we cannot find that Jones is unaffected by notice of the plaintiffs' right; but for which I should not, for a moment, entertain any hesitancy in allowing him costs of wells. I have above treated the wells as if permanent improvements. Perhaps they are not to be so treated, but rather as a part of the cost of production, like a tank for keeping the oil when produced. An allowable improvement must be that which adds to—enhances the value of—the land permanently for general uses; but a well or derrick adds nothing permanently, at least for general use, and usable only for producing oil,—the mere means or instrument of production. If this be so, there is less question about allowing their cost as but an item in the cost of production, though I have discussed the subject under the law relating to improvements. Treating cost of productive wells as cost of production of oil, we may say that, though Jones had notice of plaintiffs' right, yet he should be charged with net rents and profits, not gross,—with what he actually received,—otherwise equity inflicts a penalty. As an abortive well neither enhances the value, nor yields anything to the true owner, he ought not to be charged with its costs. I confess that, under our statute and decisions, I have hesitancy in this holding; but other members of the court do not, and feeling that Jones, under the circumstances, has strong claims to such allowance, I concur with other members in so holding. But the law ought to be clearly and accurately understood in so important a matter, and I want to state for myself what I understand to be the law, under our statute and decisions. An ejected defendant who made permanent improvements valuable to the estate, not when he merely believed his title good, but when there was reason to believe it good, may by filing his claims under § 33, chap. 90, and § 1, chap. 91, Code 1891, not only set off the value of such improvements against rents and profits, but recover any balance by which their value may exceed rents and profits; but if, when the improvements were made, there was not reason to believe the title good, he cannot even set them off against rents and profits; and notice either actual or constructive, of the defect of the improver's title and of the rights of others will preclude allowance for such improvements. He is precluded because he acts in bad faith or negligence, and cannot take away even the rents and profits of another by improvements the latter did not sanction, which by the common law became part of the land and belonged to the true owner, no matter how they came there, and which the statute allowed only to one legally without blame. The wrongdoer is not given the benefit of his wrong.

APPEAL by defendant from a judgment of the Civil District Court for the Parish of Orleans in favor of plaintiff in an action brought to recover damages for the alleged negligent killing of plaintiff's intestate. Reversed.

The facts are stated in the opinions.

Messrs. Farrar, Jonas, & Kruttschnitt, for appellant:

It is gross negligence for one to walk or step upon the track of an electric railway directly in the path of an advancing car; more especially so on a dark night, and in the middle of a block.

On approaching a street crossing of a railway track, it is the duty of a traveler to exercise his senses of sight and hearing and to look and listen for an approaching train; his failure so to do is negligence, which, in case of collision, will prevent his recovery of damages for injuries sustained.

Street-railway companies have no superior or predominant right to the use of the highways in which their cars run, over the rights of other persons passing on foot or with vehicles, except that, because of the inability of their cars to deviate from their track, other passers must give them the right to pass when occasion requires.

If a motorman running a trolley car on a highway in the day time perceives a person passing along on foot upon or closely beside the track, and apparently heedless of signals, and the motorman can arrest the movement of the car before striking the man, his failure to do so is evidence of negligence which must be submitted to the jury.

Butteli v. Jersey City H. & R. Electric R. Co. 59 N. J. L. 802.

Breaux, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

Plaintiff, tutrix of her minor children, and personally, brought this suit for $10,000 damages caused by the asserted negligence of defendant's agents and employees, which resulted, she avers, in the death of her husband, father of her children. The defendant corporation was the owner of a line of street railways running through Louisiana avenue. She alleges that her late husband was crossing the public street, about 10 o'clock at night, near his residence, fronting on the avenue, between Franklin and Liberty streets, when one of defendant's electric cars negligently and carelessly ran over her husband, inflicting injuries causing death a few minutes after the accident; that her late husband was lawfully on the street, and was at the time duly careful. The defendant pleads the general denial, and avers that the plaintiff's husband lost his life by his own carelessness and recklessness, and that, if there was negligence on its part, there was contributory negligence on the part of plaintiff's husband. From a description of the place of record, it is shown that the defendant company has a double track on Louisiana avenue,—one track for the car running down on the lower side of the avenue, between Baronne and Freret streets, and the other track for the cars going up to Carrollton on the upper side of the neutral ground between Dryades and Howard streets. Between the two tracks there is a steam railroad track of the Illinois Central Railroad. In the front of the cottage occupied by plaintiff and her late husband, he had raised the banquette, and laid a plank walk from the banquette to the neutral ground. There was no passable banquette on either side in front of this lot, and he and his family for more than three years used the plank walk and neutral ground for ingress and egress; for the ground where there should have been a banquette was low and muddy, the gutters wide and deep, and walking was practically impossible. There was a path between the Illinois Central track and the track of the defendant company, well known (it is asserted by the plaintiff) by the employees of the defendant company, where people were frequently seen walking. On the night of the accident the deceased, a few minutes prior to the accident, was standing on the Illinois Central Railroad track, and conversing with an acquaintance. Leaving his acquaintance, he walked in the direction of his house, which was about half a block away from where they were standing. His home was on the lower side of the track. He was going in the same direction that the car was going. The acquaintance with whom he was conversing walked away in an opposite direction, and met the alleged offending car, running, he says, at a rapid speed. The noise of the car stopping, because of the accident, a short distance from where it had passed him, attracted his attention. He walked back to the place of the accident. His back at the moment of the collision was turned to the car. He saw nothing of the accident. He says that the headlight of the car, as it passed him, was dim. No alarm bell was sounded. The deceased was struck by the car when he was opposite the plank walk immediately in front of his house. Evidently he had left the walk, and was crossing defendant's track on his way to the plank crossing leading to his gate, when he was struck. The car ran about 40 feet after the blow. The headlight was broken; also the fender. Two of plaintiff's witnesses testify that there was no ringing of the bell prior to the accident. The motorman, as a witness for the defendant, testifies that he could see that the deceased was in danger from where he was, and that he sounded the gong and uttered a cry to him; that he (the deceased) stepped immediately in front of the car, to his right. He and the conductor testified that the headlight was burning brightly. This is a summary of the salient facts. The case was tried before the court without the intervention of a jury. The judgment was for plaintiff in the sum of $10,000. The defendant has appealed.

Our attention is directed to the fact that the width of the path on which the defendant was walking between the tracks was not large,—only about 7 feet. The car must have been near him when he left this path or street and stepped in front of the car to go over to the plank walk opposite his home. Three steps would have carried him across. As he was struck while attempting to cross, it is, in our judgment, evident that his first step on the track must have been made when the car was dangerously near. Witnesses for the plaintiff saw the coming car at some distance. The noise made by the running car was clearly heard by witnesses who were not on the track at all. The width of the walk was, we have seen, about 7 feet. We assume that the deceased was about the center of the walk at the time that he turned to the right to cross the track of the defendant. We assume, further, that four steps was the distance from the center line of the walk in question to the center line of defendant's track. Upon this basis, about two and a half steps must have been the distance stepped from the center line of the walk to the outer line of the track over which the car runs, and one and a half steps the distance between the outer line of the car to the center line of the track. From the fact that the headlight and the fender of the car were broken, we judge that the deceased was at or very near the center line of the railroad track when he was struck. At the moment that the deceased crossed the outer line of the car, the car must have been quite near to him,—a distance which can be computed with some degree of accuracy by reference to the time it takes to walk over a space in length of about one and a half steps. It was impossible, it is evident, to stop the car, after the deceased crossed the outer line, in time to prevent the accident. The question arises, Was it prudent, in the dark, to attempt to cross? Three grounds of alleged negligence urged were the asserted speed of the car, the dim light, and failure to ring the alarm. The evidence upon these points is conflicting between the witnesses for the defendant and those for the plaintiff.

The issue brings us to a consideration of the rule that one approaching a railway crossing, or attempting at any place to cross a railroad track, must carefully look up and down the track, and in that connection we must determine whether it applies to an electric street railway. The rule itself is supported by a long list of decisions. Its correctness does not admit of any question. When street cars ran slowly, and could be stopped within a distance of a few feet, the rule for the pedestrian to exercise his senses of sight and hearing, and to stop, look, and listen, did not apply as it does to the electric cars. Even in the case of horse cars one was enjoined to be careful in walking on a railroad track, or in attempting to cross it. Greater prudence is required of a pedestrian who crosses a railway track of a steam or electric car in a city. It is his duty to exercise his senses of sight and hearing. The evidence of plaintiff's witnesses in regard to the speed of the car is in general terms. No attempt was made to approximately fix the rate at which it was running. Granted that it was running with speed; that, of itself, was not negligence, if all needful care was exercised by the company. The dim headlight, and the fact that there was no ringing of the bell at a place not known as a regular public crossing, do not relieve the pedestrian of his obligation to exercise ordinary care to avoid an injury. There was light, although it may have been dim. There must have been noise made by the moving car very near the place of the accident. One who, in the night-time, with full knowledge that the car may come at any moment behind him, attempts to cross, must use his senses to avoid an accident. In a recently well considered case this court said: "It is a well-recognized rule that a person, before attempting to cross the track of a steam or electric car, should look to ascertain whether prudently the crossing should be attempted." Snider v. New Orleans & C. R. Co. 48 La. Ann. 12. Again, in the same opinion, which has a direct application to the case before us: "The motorman upon the car had no reason to anticipate that plaintiff would attempt to cross the street under existing conditions. Plaintiff knew perfectly well that the moving car was bound on its regular trip up to a point above that street on a fixed line, and must therefore inevitably cross the path he was taking as he moved across." This case has the support of four preceding decisions of this court: Schulte v. New Orleans City & L. R. Co. 44 La. Ann. 510; Hersch v. Louisville, N. O. & T. R. Co. 44 La. Ann. 240; Smith v. Crescent City R. Co. 47 La. Ann. 833; Schernaydre v. Texas & P. R. Co. 48 La. Ann. 248.

As to the dim light, failure to ring the bell, and the speed of the car, the evidence was conflicting. The car was not without light. It had the light of the car and of the headlight. The very short distance between the deceased and the car rendered it impossible to ring the bell in time to warn him to get off the track. The car was an ordinary electric car, not noiseless. It was plainly heard by all the witnesses who testified upon the subject. These are important considerations, which have received our careful attention. Weighed with the fact that the victim of the sad accident suddenly turned and stepped one step or a step and a half from a safe path to a very unsafe place, we have concluded that he was imprudent to a degree which renders it impossible, under the rule heretofore announced by this court, to allow damages. This court has decided that the rule, "stop, look, and listen," applies to one attempting to cross an electric car track. There is greater reason for its application at night, when the motorman is less able, in the darkness, to see persons near or persons crossing or attempting to cross. Nothing of record shows that the least attempt was made to guard against the danger of an approaching car on a track over which cars frequently pass.

It is therefore ordered, adjudged, and decreed that the judgment appealed from is annulled, avoided, and reversed. It is further decreed that plaintiff's demand is rejected.

Watkins, J., dissenting:

The plaintiff instituted this suit in her own right as the surviving widow of Edward Hoelzel, and also in the capacity of natural tutrix of the children of her marriage with the deceased, for recovery from the defendant of the sum of $10,000 as damages occasioned by the death of her said husband through the gross carelessness and negligence of its agents and servants, depriving them of a support and maintenance. The defense is contributory negligence. The case was tried by the judge who found for the plaintiff the full amount claimed, and the defendant appealed. The judge a quo prepared his reasons for judgment in writing, and they are not only incorporated in the transcript, but they are reproduced in the brief of plaintiff's counsel in extenso; and, as the salient facts are brought forward in clear and concise form, I have taken the liberty of making the following extracts therefrom, namely: "The substantial facts are as follows: The defendant owns and operates a line of electric cars in this city known as the 'Judah Hart Line.' It runs from Canal street to Carrollton. On Louisiana avenue it has a double track,—one track for the cars going down on the lower side of the neutral ground, in the center of Louisiana avenue, between Baronne and Freret streets, and the other track for the cars going up to Carrollton on the upper side of the neutral ground, between Dryades and Howard streets. Between these tracks is a single track of the Illinois Central Railroad,—a steam railroad. Between Baronne and Freret and between Dryades and Howard, and especially on the lower side of Louisiana avenue, between Franklin and Liberty streets, there are no banquettes. This part of the city has been settled in the past five or six years. When a building was erected the owner would raise the banquette in front, and lay a plank walk over the gutter, and across the street to the neutral ground. To reach their homes, all the residents in that neighborhood were in the habit of walking on the neutral ground, on or between the tracks, until they were opposite their homes, when they would cross over on their plank walks. The same course was pursued in leaving their homes. They were compelled to adopt this mode and custom because the ground where a banquette should have been was low and muddy, the gutters wide and deep, and walking inconvenient, if not practically impossible. This custom was well known to the employees of the railroad company, for there was a well-beaten path between the Illinois Central track and the track of the defendant company, the plank walks were visible, and people were frequently seen walking on the neutral ground, passing up and down, and crossing over to their homes. John Hoelzel lived with his family on the lower side of Louisiana avenue, between Franklin and Liberty streets, about the center of the block, in a small cottage owned by him. In front of his cottage he had raised the banquette, and laid a plank walk from the banquette to the neutral ground in the manner described. There was no banquette on either side of him to the corner of either Franklin or Liberty streets. There was a bad, muddy place next to him, towards Franklin street, and the weeds were very high, and he and his family were compelled to use the plank walk and neutral ground for ingress and egress. They had been in the habit of doing so for three years. It was their habit before the road was built and after. On the night of April 13, 1895, John Hoelzel was returning to his home from a barber shop. He met witness Emile Gearhart on the neutral ground on Louisiana avenue, corner of Franklin. He was then half a block from his residence. They conversed five or ten minutes, standing on the track of the Illinois Central Railroad, and then Hoelzel walked towards his home,—towards the woods. The witness walked towards the river. Gearhart had hardly walked 20 feet when an electric car going down town passed him at a very rapid speed. Its headlight was dim. He walked about 20 feet further, when the car stopped. He then walked back to the car, and found that Hoelzel had been run over, horribly mangled, killed by the car, in front of the plank walk leading to his residence. The motorman did not sound his gong at the crossing, or before he struck Hoelzel. Another witness, Martin, tried to stop the car a block and a half away from where the accident happened, with the intention of going down town. He stood on the track and waved to the motorman, but the car was going so fast it was impossible to stop it, and the headlight so dim that the motorman could not or did not see him, and he had to step aside and let the car go by. He heard no gong sound from the time the car passed him until it struck Hoelzel and stopped. Martin then walked to the car in about five minutes. Other witnesses testified that the car was running at a very rapid speed, and one other that no gong was sounded. The car ran from 40 to 50 feet beyond the spot where Hoelzel was struck before it stopped. The motorman saw Hoelzel walking between the Illinois Central Railroad Company's track and the Traction Company's track. His back was to the approaching car. He was right near to the line of the car, and the motorman says that he 'saw he was in danger from where he was.' The motorman saw him when he was within 15 feet from him. It is evident from the whole testimony that Hoelzel was walking within 2 or 3 feet of the uptown rail of the Traction Company's downtown track. When he reached the plank walk leading to his house, the car was within 15 feet behind him. The motorman saw him, but he did not see or hear the car, being slightly deaf or absent-minded. He then turned to his right to go across to the plank walk to his home, stepped upon the track and was instantly killed. When he stepped upon the track it was too late for the motorman to stop his car, if he had tried so to do, as he testified. The court is of the opinion that the defendant was grossly negligent, in its motorman's running in that square at so fast a speed with a dim headlight, without sounding his gong, and in not seeing the deceased in time to give him timely warning, and that the gross carelessness of the defendant company was the true cause of the accident. The court is of the opinion, from the facts above stated, that the deceased was not guilty of contributory negligence. He had a right to walk to his home on the neutral ground, and across the track. Where 50 to 100 people daily for four or five years use a railway track for foot travel with the acquiescence of a railroad company, without their objection, such acquiescence creates a right which imposes on the company a duty of ordinary diligence to avoid injury to persons so using the track. The deceased simply did what he and his neighbors had been in the habit of doing for years, to the knowledge, without objection, and with the acquiescence, of the company."

Having gone over the testimony in the record, I feel satisfied of the correctness of the statement of my learned brother of the district court, but am of opinion that some additional extracts therefrom would somewhat fortify the facts stated by him, and I append the following:

First. In respect to the speed of the car, the failure of the motorman to sound the gong in the vicinity of the accident, and the dimness of the headlight. The statement of a witness who was standing at a street corner near by, waiting for a car, is that he 'stood on the track and tried to stop the defendant's car;' that "he stood on the rail of the track, and tried to signal [the motorman] down, but it was impossible; he did not stop, and [witness] then moved out of the way [so as] not to get knocked down; that the car was going at a very rapid rate of speed, and there was hardly any headlight; the light was bad; there was hardly any light in the headlight; that the headlight was so dim the motorman could not see him, was the reason he did not stop his car when he hailed him to do so; his headlight was not giving enough reflection;" that it was about 10 o'clock at night, and very dark. The statement of one of the defendant's witnesses—the only one introduced for the purpose of supporting the testimony of the motorman and the conductor—is that at the time of the accident he was walking along the banquette on the opposite side of the avenue from the residence of the deceased, in the same direction that the latter was going, and about ten steps in his rear; that he saw the deceased while he was talking with the watchman at the corner near by, and followed him when he started towards his home, as he wished to borrow a tool of some kind from him; that he shouted to him "to look out, just as he stepped on the track, and the car hit him at the same time" (but he does not speak of hearing the gong sounded, or seeing the illumination of the headlight, notwithstanding his close proximity to the car); that he saw the car when it was about 40 feet distant, but that "it did not take a minute—a half minute, it did not take that"—to overtake the deceased. He states further that the deceased turned from the pathway between the two tracks to take the street crossing to go to his home just at the moment he shouted to him, and he was instantly struck by the car.

Second. As to circumstances attending the accident, illustrating the carelessness of the motorman in charge of the car, and the speed of the car: A witness who resided just on the opposite side of the avenue from the deceased, and knew him well, states that he heard the report, and jumped up and ran across the street to the car; that he spoke to the motorman, and he said in reply that he thought that he had killed a man, and, it being dark, he lighted a match and saw that the dead man was Hoelzel, who lived just on the opposite side of the street from the place of the accident; that he observed "that the headlight was all bursted up, and that the fender in front of the car to protect it was bursted in half, that the skin and hair of Hoelzel's head were taken off, and it must have been done by the headlight." Another witness describes the scene thus: "Well, I ran down and jumped the gutter, and when I got over there Mr. Yokum was there; and the conductor or the motorman—one of them—said it was a negro that was lying on the track sleeping; drunk, at least, it was. That Mr. Yokum said, 'No, it is not,' and he lighted a match and said, 'It is Mr. Hoelzel.'" He also stated that the headlight was bursted and the cowcatcher broken; that Mr. Yokum raised the body up off of the track, his head facing towards the river, and his body lying across the track of the defendant, about the center, just opposite the plank walk leading to his house. Another witness who resided in the vicinity of the accident said: "Well, as soon as he could jump across the gutter he ran across the avenue to where the deceased was. That he was sitting on his gallery step at the time and heard the crash, and got up and jumped across and ran into the street. . . . When he got there he could not tell what it was, it was so dark. That he saw it was a dark object, but did not know whether it was a human being or not, when some one struck a match and pulled the head up, and he then recognized Mr. Hoelzel." He stated that he observed that the distance between the deceased and the car was apparently about 40 feet, and the headlight was broken, and the fender also. Another witness testifies that, when he arrived at the place of the accident, he spoke to the motorman about it, and he said that it was impossible for him to stop the car; that he thought he had killed a man; that he thought he saw a man on the track, but he did not know. Another witness says that she was engaged in sewing while waiting for her husband, "when she heard a car coming along at a frightful rate of speed; then, all of a sudden, when it got in the middle of the block, she heard a crash, and got up and ran out and across the track, and ran down to Mr. Hoelzel, in front of his door." The statement of the motorman is that the night was a very dark one, but aided by his headlight, he "discovered an object, . . . and as he was nearing it he could see that it was a man on the left, between the Illinois Central belt and the Traction Company's electric line, walking on the outside; that the first thing that entered his mind was, knowing it was a man, of course he would keep out of the way of the car, and as he approached him he kept right near the line of the car; that he could see that he was in danger from where he was, and sounded the gong and hallooed to him at the same time; that he stepped immediately in front of the car, to the right of witness, where the car struck him; that when he shouted to him the deceased was within 10 feet of the car; that as soon as he discovered what he had done he just threw up his hands and said, 'My God! what have I done?' and ran back through the car to the conductor, and said, 'Look out! I believe I have killed a man.'" He further states that, when he first saw there was an object on the side of the track, "he could just tell there was an object moving," and that after seeing the moving object he supposes the car ran about 40 feet, and the man kept right ahead of the car; that, when the car had approached near enough for him to hail Hoelzel and say "Look out," he stepped in front of the car and upon the track. The statement of the conductor is as follows, viz.: "Well, we were running along there about the usual rate of speed, when he heard a crash, all of a sudden, in front of the car, and he started through the car and asked the motorman what was the matter; and when he was about one third through the car the motorman turned to him, and threw up his hands and said: 'My God! I believe I have killed a man.' Just that way, and with that the car stopped, and he ran back on the track, when he saw the man laying between the rails," etc. But the conductor did not confirm the statement of the motorman to the effect that he sounded his gong near the place of the accident, nor that he shouted or hailed the deceased. Nor did he state that he sounded his gong even at the adjacent street corner, though he does say that his supposition was that he did. He admits that the fender and headlight were broken in their contact with the deceased.

The best proof that no gong was sounded at or near the scene of the accident is furnished by the replies which the motorman made to the interrogatories that were propounded to him at the time on the spur of the moment, and the voluntary statement he made to the conductor at the instant the crash occurred, and the further fact that after the accident the car was found to have passed some 40 feet beyond the place of contact, and had the deceased been plainly visible, by the aid of a good headlight, he should have been readily seen for a distance of 70 feet in front of the car, so that the car could have been stopped in time to have saved the life of the deceased. And the further important fact is that the car was moving with such frightful rapidity that its contact with the deceased produced a crash that was plainly heard by, and arrested the attention of, more than half a dozen of the witnesses, who instantly rushed to the scene; and the violence of the shock was so great that it caused the instant death of a strong man, broke down the fender, and shattered the headlight of the car! Had the deceased, under the circumstances, looked—as possibly he did—just before making the attempt to step across the street-car track, of not more than 8 feet in width, to see if a car was approaching, his reasonable belief must have been that there was no danger, as the gong had not been sounded, and the headlight was not sufficiently bright to indicate a dangerous proximity of the car, and no means were afforded him of judging of the speed of the car which was in fact so rapidly approaching him. In any view that can be taken of the testimony, the gross and culpable negligence of the motorman is manifest; and to say that an electric car can be run on a street of this city at such a frightful rate of speed as the testimony discloses that of the defendant was moving when it ran over and killed Hoelzel that dark night in April, without giving him any warning by the sound of the gong or aid of the headlight, and the corporation be exonerated from liability, is, in my opinion, to place the lives and limbs of its inhabitants in imminent peril, and leave those who are dependent upon them for society and support without any security whatever! The deceased was not upon the defendant's track, but he was traveling a plain beaten path that lies between it and that of the Illinois Central Railroad Company, and which had been in common use for years by the people of the neighborhood; and he was attempting to step across the track of the defendant in the effort to reach his home when he was run over by the defendant's car and instantly killed. The deceased had an equal right to use this pathway as a means of ingress to and egress from his house as any citizen to traverse any of the banquettes of the city, and is quite as much entitled to the protection of the law in the prudent exercise of that right. In my opinion, there was gross carelessness on the part of the defendant, and no contributory fault on the part of the deceased.

I do not think the facts of this case bring it within the scope of Snider v. New Orleans & O. R. Co. 48 La. Ann. 1, nor of McLaughlin v. New Orleans & O. R. Co. 48 La. Ann. 28; nor of Settoon v. Texas & P. R. Co. 48 La. Ann. 807. In the first case, the plaintiff attempted, in open daylight, to drive his wagon across the defendant's track on St. Charles avenue, in front of an approaching car, and was run into and injured thereby. In the second, plaintiff's little son was proceeding out Melpomene street, driving a hoop with a stick, and, while attempting to cross the defendant's track on St. Charles avenue, was struck and injured by one of its cars. In the third case, plaintiff's son was killed by a box car of the defendant while a train was being made up at a station. The boy, in attempting to cross the track at night suddenly came in contact with a pole which was used in coupling cars.

The foregoing cases are cited in defendant's brief, and it also refers to the following cases as being conclusively in its favor: In Childs v. New Orleans City R. Co. 88 La. Ann. 154, the plaintiff was held to have contributed to his injury by "either misunderstanding or not heeding the warning thus given." In White v. Vickburg, S. & P. R. Co. 42 La. Ann. 991, a lady was driving in a buggy with three young children through a street in Shreveport in open daylight, and, notwithstanding the whistle was blown and the bell rung a warning signal, she drove so close to the train that her horse became frightened, ran away, and upset the vehicle, whereby she was injured. In Hertlich v. Louisville, N. O. & T. R. Co. 44 La. Ann. 280, the plaintiff was struck and injured by a switch engine of the defendant, which was slowly moving, at a point in its yard a short distance from the street crossing in the vicinity of an electric light,—he having failed to either look or listen,—and the bell was rung and the whistle sounded. In Stanton v. Harvey, 44 La. Ann. 511, the injured lady was hard of hearing, wore a large sun-bonnet which covered both sides of her face, when she was knocked down by a horse car, and had her ankle broken by the car wheel that passed over it; but this accident occurred at a street crossing in open daylight, when, with proper care, she could have protected herself with ease. In Scheznaydre v. Texas & P. R. Co. 46 La. Ann. 248, the plaintiff's son, who was a deaf mute, was walking on the defendant's track with his back to an approaching train; but the day was clear and bright, and the usual signals were given. The engineer was not aware of his infirmity, and consequently approached the boy too closely to be able to stop the train, assuming that he had heard the warning and would get off the track. In Blackwell v. St. Louis, I. M. & S. R. Co. 47 La. Ann. 268, the plaintiffs were shown to have received injuries by the defendant's train while riding in a wagon and attempting to cross the track ahead of same, notwithstanding it was in open view in broad daylight, though there were some buildings which partially intervened. In Smith v. Crescent City R. Co. 47 La. Ann. 888, the plaintiff received injuries by a horse car running over and breaking his leg while he was walking on the track in front of same as it was approaching him from the rear; but his inattention to the approaching car was held to have been inexcusable negligence, especially as he had just parted with a friend at the corner near by, who was waiting for the car to carry him home.

Per contra, the plaintiff's counsel cite the following cases, viz.: In McGuire v. Vickburg, S. & P. R. Co. 46 La. Ann. 1548, after a careful examination and analysis of authority, we held that in an action for damages against a railroad company by the surviving parents for the loss of their son, who was run over and killed by the locomotive, the defense of contributory negligence will not avail, if by the exercise of reasonable care on the part of those in charge of the train the accident might have been avoided. This doctrine is also announced in 2 Thompson, Neg. p. 1105: Patterson, Railway Accident Law, 51, 55: Pierce, Railroads, 880. The court in its opinion says in the McGuire Case: "But it is in proof that the signal for the brakes was not given, nor any whistle sounded to announce the approaching train, until the deceased was almost under the wheels of the locomotive, and his death inevitable. The engineer says he saw an object, but very close, and could not tell what it was," etc. That case presents quite a striking likeness to the instant case, and involves an exactly similar principle, in my opinion. "It is the duty," says the author, "of drivers of cars, not only to see that the rail track is clear, but also to exercise a constant watchfulness for persons who may be approaching the track." 1 Thomp. Neg. 898; Barnes v. Shreveport City R. Co. 47 La. Ann. 1218. In Gallagher v. Crescent City R. Co. 87 La. Ann. 288, it was correctly held that "a car driver can be charged justly with negligence only where he fails to observe or do something he ought to see or do, and would notice or do with ordinary vigilance where he fails to be prepared for something visible, or at least of probable occurrence, or that might be reasonably expected of him." In this case the evidence clearly shows that the motorman of the defendant's car did not discharge his duty, but, on the contrary, was negligent, in the sense of the rule announced in that opinion. In Curley v. Illinois C. R. Co. 40 La. Ann. 810, we said that a railroad company running and operating its road through the streets of a populous city is bound to observe extraordinary precautions for the safety of the public, particularly at street crossings. In Johnson v. Lake Superior Terminal & Transfer Co. 56 N. W. 161 [86 Wis. 64], the Wisconsin court held that as it appeared from the evidence "that persons were accustomed to walk on the track, and that this had been done to such an extent that between the rails near where plaintiff was injured there was a path worn by pedestrians, while the ground on either side was so incumbered as to make it inconvenient to walk outside the track," both the question (1) of whether the defendant had licensed the public to walk on its track, or had acquiesced in such use of it; (2) whether the defendant was guilty of negligence in the method of moving its train in respect to the plaintiff, were for the jury to determine. Accepting that ruling as correct, in my opinion it applies to the instant case with far greater force, because (1) the pathway Hoelzel used was not on the defendant's track, but parallel with it; (2) the case was decided by the judge of the lower court and not by a jury. In Kris v. Missouri P. R. Co. 33 S. W. 64 [181 Mo. 533], the Missouri court held that the proof disclosing that the plaintiff's wife, in "going to a depot, walked in the space on a double-tracked railroad, between the two tracks, with an umbrella over her head, so near one of the tracks as to be struck by a train coming back of her, does not show such negligence on her part as to justify the taking of the case from the jury, there being evidence that those in charge of the train knew that people were in the habit of walking between the tracks at that point, and that they did not use proper means to prevent the accident after they saw, or by ordinary care should have seen, her peril." (My italics.) That decision seems to present an exactly parallel case to the one under consideration. In Texas & P. R. Co. v. Watkins (Tex. Civ. App.) 28 S. W. 760, the Texas court held (1) that "where a railroad company has notice that a large number of pedestrians used its tracks at a particular place, and takes no steps to prevent this use, it is negligence for its train to approach such place without giving warning;" (2) that "where a person walking along a railroad track, at a point where a great number of persons were accustomed to walk with the acquiescence of the company, is so startled by suddenly seeing a train, which had approached from the rear to within a few feet of her without warning, that she jumps in front of it, she will not be held guilty of contributory negligence." (My italics.) But an even stronger case is stated than either of the foregoing in Chamberlain v. Missouri P. R. Co. 133 Mo. 587, in which the Missouri court held that "where a train is running through a populous neighborhood, just outside the city limits, where workmen have for years been accustomed to use the track in going to and returning from their work, and the company's servants in charge of the train see, or by the exercise of ordinary care may see, a person on the track in time to avoid a collision, but fail to use such care, the company will be liable, though the person injured was a trespasser." (My italics.) In Roth v. Union Depot Co. 43 Pac. 641 [13 Wash. 525, 81 L. R. A. 855], the Washington court held that "where from fifty to one hundred people, daily, for four or five years, use a railway track for foot travel, with the acquiescence of the railway company, such acquiescence creates a right, which imposes on the company a duty of ordinary diligence to avoid injury to persons so using the track." (My italics.)

It is upon the opinion in this last case that our learned brother of the lower court chiefly relied for the clear and sagacious statement he made of the plaintiff's case; aided, it is true, by the opinions of this court in pari materia. A careful examination of the law and evidence applicable to this case has convinced me that the liability of the defendant is clearly made out, and that deceased was without contributory fault. The judgment of the lower court should be affirmed. For these reasons I dissent from the opinion of the majority of the court.

RHODE ISLAND SUPREME COURT.

Marlin HENSON, Admr., etc.,
v.

Lydia D. BECKWITH.

A lessor who is not in possession or control of an elevator well in a leased building which the tenant has covenanted to keep in repair is not liable for the death of a person who falls into it while delivering goods to the tenant on the latter's invitation, although there was a dangerous defect consisting of a large opening between the elevator and the outer wall.

(June 29, 1897.)

NOTE.—As to the liability of a landlord for injuries to tenant's guests and servants from defects in premises, see also McConnell v. Lemley (La.) 84 L. R. A. 609.

ON DEMURRER by defendant to the declaration and by plaintiff to the plea in an action to recover damages for death by the alleged negligence of defendant. Demurrer to declaration sustained.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. Joseph C. Ely, Herbert Almy, and James M. Gillrain, for defendant:

The obligation to keep the premises in repair being in the tenant, if an accident happened to anyone through the defective condition of the elevator during the existence of the lease, then the defendant is not liable in damages, because she would have no power to make either repairs or changes in said building until after expiration of the lease.

State v. Piper, 89 N. C. 551; 12 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law, p. 682, cases cited in note 3.

If the lessee has covenanted to make repairs the landlord is not liable for injuries due to defective premises, because it cannot be said that the landlord has given authority that the premises should be kept in a dangerous state.

Pretty v. Bickmore, L. R. 8 C. P. 401; Dalry v. Savage, 145 Mass. 38; Guinnell v. Eamer, L. R. 10 C. P. 658.

The law presumes that the tenant was bound to repair, and that the landlord was not liable.

Batterman v. Finn, 32 How. Pr. 501; Kastor v. Newhouse, 4 E. D. Smith, 20; Rich v. Basterfield, 4 C. B. 783; Clancy v. Byrne, 56 N. Y. 129, 15 Am. Rep. 391.

As there is no allegation in the declaration that the plaintiff's intestate was rightfully upon the defendant's premises, it follows that defendant owed no duty to him to keep the elevator safe, and so is not liable for the injury.

Smith v. Tripp, 18 R. I. 152; Gibson v. Leonard, 143 Ill. 182, 17 L. R. A. 588; Woodruff v. Bowen, 138 Ind. 431, 22 L. R. A. 198; Beehler v. Daniels, 18 R. I. 563, 27 L. R. A. 512; 16 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law, p. 415.

It must be presumed, in the absence of an averment to the contrary, that plaintiff's intestate knew of the condition of the elevator, as it was an obvious defect, as appears by the declaration itself; and the defendant is not liable.

Harpel v. Fall, 68 Minn. 520; Ellis v. Waldron, 19 R. I. —, Index RR, 188; Davidson v. Fischer, 11 Colo. 588; Bedell v. Berkey, 76 Mich. 435.

It does not appear directly by averment in the declaration that the tenant at whose request the plaintiff's intestate entered the elevator had any right to use it himself. Then how can the tenant authorize another to use it, so as in case of accident to hold the defendant liable?

Ellis v. Waldron, 19 R. I. —, Index RR, 190; Third Nat. Bank v. Angell, 18 R. I. 1; 1 Chitt., Pl. 227-256; Andrews' Stephens, Pl. ¶ 205.

An allegation that the defendant knew of the defective construction of said elevator at the time of the making of the lease to Cady is necessary to the maintenance of the plaintiff's case.

Marshall v. Heard, 59 Tex. 266; Dalry v. Rice (Mass.) 27 Am. L. Reg. N. S. 253, note.

Where a lessee has covenanted to repair, and an accident happens during the continuance of the lease, due to negligence, the lessee is alone liable, because he has it in his power to alter the premises and make them safe for the use made of them.

Dalry v. Rice (Mass.) 27 Am. L. Reg. N. S. 251, note; Guinnell v. Eamer, L. R. 10 C. P. 658; Leonard v. Storer, 115 Mass. 86, 15 Am. Rep. 76; Dalry v. Savage, 145 Mass. 38.

It was optional with the tenant to use the premises with the defective elevator or not, and if he made use of it as it was, he and not the landlord is liable, because the premises could be used without the elevator.

Rich v. Basterfield, 4 C. B. 783; Mallen v. Morrill, 126 Mass. 545, 30 Am. Rep. 635.

The hole was not in and of itself a nuisance, and it was not negligence in defendant to maintain it there.

Freeman v. Hunnewell, 163 Mass. 210; Caldwell v. Blade, 153 Mass. 84; Malloy v. New York Real Estate Assn. 13 Misc. 496; Hilton v. Waller, 95 Iowa, 545; Harpel v. Fall, 68 Minn. 520.

Messrs. Bassett & Mitchell, for plaintiff, contra:

The owner of leased premises is liable for such an accident caused by a defective construction of the premises existing prior to such lease, which he allows to remain unremedied, although the entire premises are in the possession of the lessee. This is a liability which he shares equally with the tenant.

Cramer*, 160 Mass. 496; Lee v. McLaughlin (Me.) 26 L. R. A. 198, note b.

Stiness, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The declaration alleges that the defendant, owner of a building known as the "Owen Building," on Dyer street, in the city of Providence, on April 3, 1895, and for a long time prior thereto, knew of a dangerous defect in the construction of the elevator well therein, by leaving a large opening between the elevator and the outer wall; that while the plaintiff's intestate was delivering goods, on said April 3, to a tenant in the building, by his invitation, and while in the exercise of due care, said intestate fell through the opening and was killed. The defendant demurs to the declaration for lack of material averments, but as these could be supplied by amendment, and as the real question of the case arises in a broader way upon the defendant's plea, to which the plaintiff demurs, we will consider the whole case as it is shown by the pleadings.

The plea set up the fact that, excepting a small store, the whole building, together with the elevator, was under lease from January 1, 1895, to December 31, 1899, with covenant by the lessee to keep the interior in repair, and that the defendant had no control over the elevator, nor the right to make alterations. The case as thus stated raises the question of a landlord's liability to a stranger for the defective condition of premises under lease. In Joyce v. Martin, 15 R. I. 558, this court recognized three classes of cases of this sort: First. Where the owner leases premises which are a nuisance, or must, in the nature of things, become so by their use, then, whether in or out of possession, he is liable for injuries resulting from such nuisance. Second. Where premises are let for rent or profit, to be used for purposes for which they are not fit or safe, and all this was known, or ought to have been known, to the lessor, he is also liable for injuries resulting from such use. Third. Where property, at the time of a demise, is not a nuisance, and an injury happens by some act of the tenant, or while he has entire possession and control of the premises, the owner is not liable. These three rules seem to us to be both comprehensive and correct. Our inquiry, therefore, is to which class the case at bar belongs. The first class of cases includes those where an owner has, by an express or implied invitation, brought persons to danger and injury, under conditions which amount to a nuisance. Examples of this kind are found in Gordon v. Cummings, 152 Mass. 518, 9 L. R. A. 640, where an owner maintained a common hallway for his tenants, to which a letter carrier was thereby invited; Leahey v. Godfrey, 138 Mass. 315, where an owner maintained an uncovered well in a passageway to a house, to which a police officer was held to be invited; La Rue v. Farren Hotel Co. 116 Mass. 67; Irvine v. Wood, 51 N. Y. 224, 10 Am. Rep. 603, and Tomlin v. Hampton, 129 Ill. 883, which were cases of holes in or adjacent to a public walk; and House v. Metcalf, 27 Conn. 681, where an over-shot water wheel, so near the road as to frighten horses, was held to be a nuisance. Wendell v. Baxter, 12 Gray, 494; Moody v. New York, 43 Barb. 282; Albert v. State, Ryan, 66 Md. 325, 59 Am. Rep. 159, like Joyce v. Martin, were cases of piers and wharves to which the public were held to be invited. Of the second class, Carson v. Godley, 26 Pa. 111, 67 Am. Dec. 404, is an example, the building having been unfit for the purpose for which it was let. We think it is clear that the case at bar does not fall within the first of these classes. The defect complained of was not in or near a public way, nor in a part of the premises held out by the owner for the entry of strangers, so as to amount to an invitation to a place which is a nuisance. The term "nuisance," in legal phraseology, "is applied to that class of wrongs that arise from the unreasonable, unwarrantable, or unlawful use by a person of his own property, real or personal, . . . working an obstruction of, or injury to, a right of another or to the public." Wood, Nuisances, § 1. One has the right to erect the building, in general terms, as he pleases; and, even if there be dangerous places in it he violates no right of other people in so doing. If he invites others into such a building, he is, to some extent, responsible for their safety; but the building is not on that account a nuisance. So, one has the right to hire such a building, and under the same limitation, he does not thereby maintain a nuisance. Nor is the case at bar within the second class of cases above described. It does not appear that the building was unfit for the purposes for which it was let. The defect complained of was open and obvious. It could easily have been guarded against by warning or, a barrier. Being a freight elevator, it was of itself a warning that it was not intended for the safety of passengers, and equally so was it a warning to those at work upon it. The injury was not caused by any defect in the elevator itself. Such elevators are now in common use, and it is a matter of common knowledge that they are more or less unprotected at the sides. The declaration does not state whether the plaintiff's intestate was an employee of the lessee, or a stranger; but it seems to imply the latter in stating that he entered upon the invitation of a tenant in said building. If he was an employee, the rule of Kelley v. Siter Spring Bleaching & Dyeing Co. 12 R. I. 112, 34 Am. Rep. 615, that one who works exposed to manifest danger cannot look to his employer if he is injured, would apply with stronger reason to exonerate the lessor of the employer. If he was a stranger, on the premises at the invitation of a tenant, the case falls within the third class described above, and the owner is not liable. In Harpel v. Fall, 63 Minn. 520, the rule is stated that where there is no agreement to repair leased premises by the landlord, and he is not guilty of any fraud or concealment as to their safe condition, and the defects in the premises are not secret, but obvious, the tenant takes the risk of their safe occupancy; and the landlord is not liable to him, or to any person entering under his title, or who is upon the premises by his invitation, for injuries sustained by the unsafe condition of the premises. To the same effect are Freeman v. Hunnewell, 168 Mass. 210; Leonard v. Storer, 115 Mass. 86, 15 Am. Rep. 76; Mollen v. Morrill, 126 Mass. 545, 30 Am. Rep. 695; Davidson v. Fischer, 11 Colo. 583. Shearman & Redfield on Negligence, 4th ed. § 711, states the rule and the reason for it thus: "Those who claim upon the ground that they were invited into a dangerous place must seek their remedy against the person who invited them. If they are the guests of the tenant he, and not the landlord, is the person from whom they must seek redress for injuries caused by any defects in the premises, even though the defects existed when the lease was made; for such persons would never have suffered any injuries from these defects if they had not entered the premises; and this entry was not made at the request of the landlord or any agent of his." Bearing in mind the distinction of cases such as those cited above, where an invitation by a landlord may be implied, this rule limits the liability of the lessor and the lessee to their own acts with reference to a stranger.

Do the facts in this case amount to an implied invitation by the landlord? We think not. In Gordon v. Cummings and Leahey v. Godfrey the landlords were in control of the dangerous passageways, and so themselves held out the invitation to enter. So in places where the public go, the owner is held liable because of his participation in a nuisance.

But it would be a startling proposition that every owner who has leased property to others is liable for its absolute security, at the time of letting, to every person whom a tenant may invite to the premises, when such owner can neither have knowledge of such entry nor the chance for warning or protection. We do not think that the law goes to this extent; yet such a proposition would be necessary to sustain the present case. Ordinarily a freight elevator is used by employees. Can it be said that a landlord is bound to know that it will be used by strangers? The tenant and his servants, knowing its condition, may use it carefully and safely. If, then, the tenant invites a stranger to use it, he is the one who should give warning and look out for the safety of his guest. We are unable to see how the landlord in such a case can be held responsible, without saying that nobody has a right to let property that is in any way dangerous or out of repair, even though the lessee may be willing to take it as it is, and be able to use it with safety, having knowledge of the risk. Such a doctrine would be a serious limitation upon the ownership of real property. For these reasons, we conclude that, as the building in question was not a nuisance, nor unfit for the purpose for which it was let, by reason of any secret defect which the landlord may be presumed to know, and as the plaintiff's intestate was not upon the premises by invitation of the defendant, express or implied, and as the defendant was not in possession or control of the elevator well, the plaintiff shows no right of action against the defendant.

The demurrer to the defendant's plea is overruled, and the demurrer to the declaration is sustained. Case remitted to the common pleas division for further proceedings.

TEXAS COURT OF CRIMINAL APPEALS.

Abe RICH, Appt.,
v.
[STATE of Texas.

(.....Tex.....)

The Texas statute against betting on the result of an election is not violated where one party offers to bet a specified amount which he puts up, and the other puts up a smaller amount, which is to be forfeited upon his failure within a specified time to put up the balance, which he does not do, so that a forfeiture is declared.

(October 12, 1897.)

APPPEAL by defendant from a judgment of the County Court for Anderson County convicting him of betting on an election. Reversed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. Thomas B. Greenwood & Son, for appellant:

There was no evidence that defendant had ever wagered or bet, in any manner whatever, upon the result of any public election, held or to be held within this state.

Penal Code, arts. 395, 396; Covington v. State, 28 Tex. App. 225; Boston v. State, 5 Tex. App. 383, 32 Am. Rep. 575; Latham v. State, 19 Tex. App. 307; Hoffman v. State, 12 Tex. App. 407; Vician v. State, 16 Tex. App. 264; Harrison v. State, 8 Tex. App. 586.

There was no evidence that the agreement claimed by the state to constitute a wager or bet had any relation whatever to a public election as defined in the Penal Code, or to any such election as that alleged in the indictment herein.

v. State, 12 Tex. App. 222; Latham v. State, 19 Tex. App. 307.

Mr. Mann Trice for the State.

Henderson, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

Appellant was convicted of betting on the result of a public election, and his punishment assessed at a fine of $25; hence this appeal.

The statement of facts is as follows: Dick Wright testified for the state: "My name is Dick Wright. I know the defendant Abe Rich. I did not bet with him upon the election. I did agree to bet $25 with Abe Rich in Anderson county, Texas, on the result of a public election to be held in the city of Palestine on the 6th day of April, 1897, and put up $5 of the money, and agreed to put the balance in the stakeholder's hands by 12 o'clock that day, which was one or two days before the election. Abe Rich did offer to bet $25 upon Mr. Bowers. I was in a crowd, in which he made the offer, and, being a Burkitt man, I did not like to see his offer go unchallenged, though I had found out that Mr. Burkitt was probably going to be beaten, and I was not willing to put $25 up on him; so I agreed to put up $5 as a guaranty that I would take the bet by 12 o'clock, the arrangement being that by putting up the $5 I was to have an option on the bet until 12 o'clock—that is, the bet was to be mine if I put up the other $20 by 12 o'clock, and, if I did not, the $5 was to belong to Mr. Rich. The $25 of Mr. Rich and my $5 were put in the hands of Mr. John D. Grigsby, with the understanding that, if I did not put up the full $25 by 12 o'clock, then he was to pay over the $30 in his hands to Mr. Rich. I did not put up any more than the $5, and told Mr. Grigsby to pay the $5 over to Mr. Rich, which he did. The $5 I put up was a sort of security for my taking the bet, and it gave me the preference over all others. The offer by Mr. Rich was an even bet, and he was not offering any odds. The money was turned over to Mr.

Rich by Mr. Grigsby before the election was held, and under our arrangement it was Mr. Rich's when I failed to put up the $20, no matter how the election might have gone." John D. Grigsby testified for the state: "I know the defendant, Abe Rich. He and Dick Wright came to me on the day before the city election and placed $30 in my hands, of which Mr. Rich put up $25 and Mr. Wright $5. They told me that, if Mr. Wright did not put up $20 more by 12 o'clock, to pay it all over to Mr. Rich. Before 12 o'clock, Mr. Wright told me he was not going to put up the $20, and to turn over the $30 to Mr. Rich, which I did. This was before the election, and under my instructions the $30 was to be paid Rich upon Wright's default to put up $20 more, without reference to the election results."

On this statement of facts, appellant presents two questions: First, that there was no actual bet made between the parties appellant and Wright; and, second, no venue is shown by the testimony. "A bet or wager is ordinarily an agreement between two or more that a sum of money or some valuable thing, in contributing which all agree to take part, shall become the property of one or more of them on the happening in the future of an event, at the present uncertain, or upon the ascertainment of a fact in dispute. The term is applied both to the contract of betting or wagering, and to the thing or sum bet or wagered." 4 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law, new ed. p. 5. "Betting upon a game is the mutual agreement and tender of a gift of something valuable, which is to belong to the one or to the other of the contending parties, according to the result of such trial." See Stearnes v. State, 21 Tex. 604, and Long v. State, 22 Tex. App. 194, 58 Am. Rep. 638. The usual signification of "to bet" "is, to put to hazard a sum ascertained upon a future happening of some event then uncertain." Martin v. State, 71 Miss. 87. "A bet is a wager, and the betting is complete when the offer to bet is accepted." State v. Welch, 7 Port. (Ala.) 465. Now, the question here presents itself, Did the parties make a completed bet on the result of the election? There is no controversy about the testimony on this point. Both of the witnesses agree, in effect, as to what was done. Rich, the defendant, proposed to bet on the witness Dick Wright $25 on the result of a public election to be held in the city of Palestine, on the 6th of April, 1897. It seems that Rich offered to bet that Bowers would beat Burkitt. (What office they were running for is not stated.) Wright agreed to take his bet. Defendant put by his money, $25, but Wright put up $5 as a guaranty that he would take the bet by 12 o'clock; the arrangement being that, by putting up $5, he could close the bet by putting up the remaining $20 by 12 o'clock of that day, and if he did not put up the balance, the $5 was forfeited. He did not put up the remainder by the time stipulated, and forfeited the $5, which was paid by the stakeholder over to the defendant. From this we gather that the understanding of the parties was that it should be a cash bet, all the money on both sides to be put up in cash, and the $5 put up by Wright was to be forfeited if he did not put up the remainder. It was so forfeited before the result, and regardless of the result. Under this state of facts, was there a betting between the parties? The bet, when completed, was to be $25. That was to be on a certain result. The putting up of the $5 did not complete the bet. It was not staked on the result of the election, but was to become a forfeit to defendant in case Wright did not put up the balance of the $25; and it was claimed as a forfeit, because the bet was not completed. So that the most that can be said is that there was an executory agreement to make a bet of $25 between the parties, but this was never consummated. The statute does not seem to authorize a conviction on account of such an executory agreement, but only authorizes a conviction where there is an absolute bet made upon the result of a public election. We do not think, under the proof in this case, that such a bet was made between the parties. It is true, the parties could have bet without putting up any money at all, but that does not seem to be the character of bet they undertook to make; but it was a cash bet, in which each of the parties should put up a certain amount of money, and one of the parties put up all the money that he was to bet, and the other only put up $5, which by the terms of the agreement he was to forfeit if he did not complete the bet.

In the view we have taken above, it is not necessary to discuss the other question raised by the appellant, as to whether or not the venue was sufficiently proved, or the effect of the recent law on that subject (this case having been tried before said law went into effect). We would observe, however, that the proof on the subject is exceedingly meager. Moreover, the evidence fails to show us what the character of the election was—whether it was for city officers, county officers, or a special election, or its character,—or for what office Bowers and Burkitt were candidates. The evidence should have shown these matters.

Because, in our opinion, the evidence does not support the verdict, the judgment is reversed, and the cause remanded.

I. The general rule as to admissibility.

a. When admissible.

The unsupported opinions of witnesses other than physicians and the subscribing witnesses to a will as to the capacity of a person, considered merely as opinions, are not admissible in evidence. State v. Brinyea, 5 Ala. 241; McCurry v. Hooper, 12 Ala. 823, 46 Am. Dec. 280; McDaniel v. Crosby, 19 Ark. 533; Grant v. Thompson, 4 Conn. 203, 10 Am. Dec. 119; Armstrong v. State, 30 Fla. 170, 17 L. R. A. 484; Potts v. House, 6 Ga. 324, 50 Am. Dec. 329; Kenworthy v. Williams, 5 Ind. 375; Turner v. Cook, 36 Ind. 123; State v. Geddis, 42 Iowa 268; Godden v. Burke, 35 La. Ann. 160; Eloi v. Eloi, 36 La. Ann. 563; Stewart v. Redditt, 3 Md. 67; Townshend v. Townshend, 7 Gill, 10; Re Pinney, 27 Minn. 280; Hycr v. Little, 20 N. J. Eq. 443; Crowell v. Kirk, 3 Dev. L. 355; Puryear v. Reese, 6 Coldw. 21; Gibson v. Gibson, 9 Yerg. 329.

An exception exists to the general rule of evidence that witnesses can only speak as to facts, and cannot be permitted to state their belief or opinions, however, where the issue is as to sanity or insanity. Carr v. State, 24 Tex. App. 562, dictum; Crane v. Northfield, 33 Vt. 123, dictum.

tinuance of a criminal case on the ground of the absence of witnesses complied strictly with all the requirements of § 962 of the Penal Code, and it appeared that the proof which the accused expected to make by the absent witnesses was not only material upon the controlling issue in the case, but was also such as he could not as fully and satisfactorily make by any other witness or witnesses, it was error not to

And what is mental capacity to make a contract or will or to deliver truthful testimony is a question which must depend very greatly upon the opinions of those who have had opportunities for observing the conduct of the party and the development of the intellectual faculties. Bricker v. Lightner, 40 Pa. 199.

And proof of insanity by ordinary witnesses is not restricted to proof of facts coming within the knowledge of witnesses, and from which the jury may draw an inference of sanity or insanity, but may include the belief of such witnesses founded on opportunities of personal observation, which may be given to the jury to aid them in forming a correct conclusion. Baldwin v. State, 12 Mo. 231.

And the rule is laid down generally that opinions of nonexpert witnesses on the question of sanity or insanity are admissible in evidence where they state the facts and circumstances upon which the opinions expressed by them are predicated. Ford v. State, 71 Ala. 385; Burney v. Torrey, 100 Ala. 157; People v. Sanford, 43 Cal. 29; Grant v. Thompson, 4 Conn. 203, 10 Am. Dec. 119; Dunham's Appeal, 27 Conn. 182; Maxwell v. Winans, 69 Md. 475; Cannaday v. Lynch, 27 Minn. 436; Re Pinney, 27 Minn. 284; State v. Bryant, 93 Mo. 273; State v. Williamson, 106 Mo. 162; Farrell v. Brennan, 32 Mo. 328; Sharp v. Kansas City Cable R. Co. 114 Mo. 94; Hay v. Miller, 48 Neb. 156; Carpenter v. Hatch, 64 N. H. 573; DeWitt v. Barly, 17 N. Y. 340; State v. Ketcher, 70 N. C. 621; Price v. Richmond & D. R. Co. 38 S. C. 199; Clary v. Clary, 2 Ired. L. 78; Thomas v. State, 40 Tex. 60; Cockrill v. Cox, 65 Tex. 609; Scalf v. Collin County, 80 Tex. 514; Carr v. State, 24 Tex. App. 562; Williams v. State, 37 Tex. Crim. Rep. —, 39 S. W. 687; Harris v. State, 18 Tex. App. 287; Morse v. Crawford, 17 Vt. 502, 44 Am. Dec. 349; Cram v. Cram, 33 Vt. 15; Hathaway v. National L. Ins. Co. 48 Vt. 33; Foster v. Dickerson, 64 Vt. 233.

This is the doctrine of the principal case.

They may announce the result impressed upon their minds by the occurrences specifically testified to by them. Godden v. Burke, 35 La. Ann. 160; Gibson v. Gibson, 9 Yerg. 329.

There is no difference in the rule permitting an expert or a nonexpert to give his opinion as to the mental capacity of the testator, except that the former is allowed to give his opinion upon facts testified to by other witnesses and which are assumed to be true, while the latter is limited to giving his opinion based upon the facts to which he has himself deposed. Foster v. Dickerson, 64 Vt. 233.

Thus, nonprofessional witnesses should be allowed to state their opinions as to the sanity of the accused in a criminal prosecution, derived from grant the continuance, or at least postpone the trial until the attendance of these witnesses could be had.

2. The rule above announced is specially applicable to a case in which the accused was indicted for murder, and the main defense was that at the time of the homicide he was afflicted with insanity, alleged to have been produced by a chronic disease originating at an early period of his life, the absent witnesses being persons who had exceptional opportunities for knowing the accused and his mental and physical condition,—two of them being his brothers, with whom he had for years associated more intimately than with other relatives; another a witness who had been acquainted with him from their acquaintance with him and observation of his conduct, appearance, and actions. Norris v. State, 16 Ala. 778; Upetone v. People, 109 Ill. 169; Phelps v. Com. 17 Ky. L. Rep. 708; Genz v. State, 58 N. J. L. 482; Schlenker v. State, 9 Neb. 241; State v. Potts, 100 N. C. 457; McClackey v. State, 5 Tex. App. 320; Webb v. State, 5 Tex. App. 596; State v. Maier, 36 W. Va. 787.

And nonexpert witnesses in a trial for murder may give their opinions as to the sanity or insanity of the accused, accompanied by the facts upon which they are founded. People v. Wreden, 59 Cal. 302; Choice v. State, 31 Ga. 424; Jamison v. People, 145 Ill. 357; State v. Klinger, 46 Mo. 224; State v. Erb, 74 Mo. 199; Clark v. State, 12 Ohio, 483, 40 Am. Dec. 481; Territory v. Hart, 7 Mont. 489; Taylor v. Com. 109 Pa. 262; State v. Leehman, 2 S. D. 171; Dove v. State, 8 Heisk. 343; Ellis v. State, 33 Tex. Crim. Rep. 86; Williams v. State, 37 Tex. Crim. Rep. —, 39 S. W. 687.

And nonexpert witnesses as well as experts may give their opinion as to whether a person accused of theft is afflicted with kleptomania, where most of the symptoms of the disease are testified to by them, and his thefts and propensities to steal were notorious among those who knew him and associated with him. Harris v. State, 18 Tex. App. 287.

Where the conduct and language of the accused after the commission of a crime, not forming a part of the res gestæ, are admissible in evidence, it is competent for the witness, after stating them, to give his opinion, based upon them, as to the sanity of the accused. Bolling v. State, 54 Ark. 533.

And a sheriff in charge of a person accused of crime and under arrest, who warns the accused, may testify to anything which the defendant said to him, and, after having stated detailed conversations, facts, acts, and his observations of the accused, may give an opinion as to his sanity or insanity. Burt v. State (Tex. Crim. App.) 40 S. W. 1000.

So, the opinion of nonexpert witnesses as to the capacity of a party to make a contract at the time it was made is admissible in evidence in an action upon the contract when given in connection with the facts upon which it is predicated. Cram v. Cram, 38 Vt. 15; Kilgore v. Cross, 1 Fed. Rep. 573; Stewart v. Spedden, 5 Md. 433.

And the opinions of witnesses, who, from habits of daily or common intercourse with or observation of the person whose sanity is in question, could make an intelligent comparison of his mental manifestations with his conduct when he was admitted to be sane, are admissible in evidence on the question of his mental capacity to make a contract, when given with the facts upon which they are founded. Beller v. Jones, 22 Ark. 92.

And the opinion of a nonexpert witness as to the mental capacity of a person signing a release, who had stated the opportunities he had had for judging, and detailed his conversations with her for a period of about three years with reference to the matter in question, are admissible in evidence on a question involving the validity of the release, when confined to the question of mental capacity. Chickering v. Brooks, 61 Vt. 554.

So, the opinions of witnesses as to the sanity of a grantor may be given in evidence in an action involving the validity of his deed, but the facts upon which they are founded must also be given. Doe, Sutton, v. Reagan, 5 Blackf. 217, 33 Am. Dec. 466; Frizzell v. Reed, 77 Ga. 724; Stumph v. Miller, 142 38 L. R. A.

Eicessor*, 146 Pa. 359; Doe, McDougald, v. McLean, Winst. L. pt. 1, p. 120; Parkhurst v. Hosford, 21 Fed. Rep. 823.

And a nonexpert witness is competent to express an opinion as to the mental capacity of a grantor whose deed is sought to be set aside for undue influence and fraud founded upon association with the grantor. Smith v. Smith, 117 N. C. 323.

So, nonexpert witnesses in a will contest may give their opinions as to the capacity or incapacity of the testator where the facts or circumstances upon which they are founded are disclosed. Abraham v. Wilkins, 17 Ark. 222; Brooks's Estate, 54 Cal. 471; Re Taylor, 92 Cal. 564; Dunham's Appeal, 27 Conn. 192; Shanley's Appeal, 62 Conn. 325; Potts v. House, 6 Ga. 324, 50 Am. Townshend*, 7 Gill, 10; Carpenter v. Hatch, 64 N. H. 573; Bost v. Bost, 37 N. C. 477; Shaver v. McCarthy, 110 Pa. 339; Blocher v. Hostetter, 2 Grant. Cas. 238; Piddcock v. Tryon, 7 Serg. & R. 90, 10 Am. Dec. 444; Gibson v. Gibson, 9 Yerg. 329; Puryear v. Reese, 6 Coldw. 21; Jamison v. Jamison, 3 Houst. (Del.) 109; Ethridge v. Bennett, 9 Houst. (Del.) 295; Garrison v. Blanton, 48 Tex. 299; Brown v. Mitchell, 75 Tex. 9; Foster v. Dickerson, 64 Vt. 233; Fishburne v. Ferguson, 84 Va. 37; Tatham v. Wright, 2 Russ. & M. 1.

The right to give opinions as to the capacity of a testator is not confined to subscribing witnesses to a will, though execution thereof must be proved by them. Martin v. Perkins, 56 Miss. 304; Morton v. Heidorn, 135 Mo. 608.

The opinions of witnesses having peculiar advantages of knowing as to the capacity of the testator are admissible in evidence in a will contest without reference to the weight which may attach to them. Whitelaw v. Sims, 90 Va. 583.

So, witnesses who have been long acquainted with a person whose sanity is in question upon an inquiry of lunacy may give their opinions as to the soundness of his mind where they detail the facts and circumstances within their own knowledge upon which such opinions are based. Re Vanauken, 10 N. J. Eq. 190.

And the opinions of nonexpert witnesses as to the mental condition of the insured upon an issue in an action upon an insurance policy as to his sanity at the time of committing suicide are admissible in evidence in connection with a statement of the facts and circumstances within their personal knowledge upon which their opinions are based. Connecticut Mut. L. Ins. Co. v. Lathrop, 111 U. S. 612, 28 L. ed. 536; Mutual L. Ins. Co. v. Leubrie, 38 U. S. App. 37, 71 Fed. Rep. 843, 15 C. C. A. 332; Charter Oak L. Ins. Co. v. Rodall, 95 U. S. 235, 24 L. ed. 433.

And nonexpert witnesses in an action for a personal injury based upon negligence, who have stated their observations and the facts attendant his childhood; and the remaining one a physician, who had known the accused all his life, and was professionally familiar with the nature of his alleged disease,—and the application for a continuance averring that all these witnesses would swear to his insanity, and setting forth in detail the facts upon which their testimony to this effect would be based.

upon the condition of the person injured before any mental impairment, and such observations and facts after the alleged impairment, may be permitted to state their conclusions or opinions based on such facts or observations, and may make comparison of the mental condition of such person before and after the injury alleged to have resulted in affecting his mind. New York, C. & St. L. R. Co. v. Luebeck, 157 Ill. 595; West Chicago Street R. Co. v. Fishman, 169 Ill. 195.

So, the absence of witnesses in a criminal prosecution in which insanity is alleged as a defense, who would give their opinions as to the sanity of the accused gathered from their association with him and their observation of his conduct, language, and appearance for some weeks prior to and including the day of the commission of the criminal act, is a sufficient ground for a continuance. Webb v. State, 5 Tex. App. 598.

And that the opinion of a nonexpert witness on the question of sanity or insanity would be but cumulative is not sufficient reason for its exclusion, and is not a good ground for overruling an application for continuance otherwise sufficient for the purpose of procuring such evidence. Harris v. State, 18 Tex. App. 287.

In Garrison v. Blanton, 48 Tex. 292, it was held that it is not material whether the witness detailed the describable facts upon which his conclusions are founded before or after the expression of his opinion.

But the rule has been repeatedly stated to be that the opinion is admissible after the witness has stated the facts and reasons upon which it is based. People v. Wreden, 59 Cal. 392; American Bible Soc. v. Price, 115 Ill. 623; Re Norman, 72 Iowa, 84; State v. Stickley, 41 Iowa, 232; Parsons v. Parsons, 66 Iowa, 754; Baughman v. Baughman, 82 Kan. 538; Territory v. Hart, 7 Mont. 489; Sheehan v. Kearney (Mia), 85 L. R. A. 102; Wood v. State, 58 Mia. 743; Hay v. Miller, 48 Neb. 156; State v. Leehman, 2 S. D. 171; Dove v. State, 3 Heisk. 348; Cockrill v. Cox, 65 Tex. 669; Foster v. Dickerson, 64 Vt. 238; Hathaway v. National L. Ins. Co. 48 Vt. 336.

In Re Norman, 72 Iowa, 84, State v. Stickley, 41 Iowa, 232, infra, V. b. 1, was distinguished upon the ground that in that case the witness had not detailed the conversations and actions of the defendant at the time, and his opinion was excluded upon the ground that it did not appear that he was in a position to form a correct one.

And that a nonexpert witness will not be permitted to give an opinion as to the mental condition of another without first stating the facts upon which the opinion is based. Pennsylvania Co. v. Newmeyer, 129 Ind. 401; State v. Pennyman, 68 Iowa, 216; Shaeffer v. State, 61 Ark. 241; Williams v. State, 37 Tex. Crim. Rep. —, 39 S. W. 637; Rariok v. Ulmer, 144 Ind. 26; Roberts v. Trawick, 18 Ala. 68; Grubb v. State, 117 Ind. 277; Sheehan v. Kearney (Mia), 85 L. R. A. 102; State v. Abrams, 11 Or. 169; Dickinson v. Dickinson, 61 Pa. 401; First Nat. Bank v. Wirebach, 106 Pa. 87, 12 W. N. C. 150; Eilessor v. Eilessor, 146 Pa. 350; Adams v. State, 34 Tex. Crim. Rep. 470; Yankre v. State, 51 Wis. 464. And see infra, VI. b.

And that where the testimony of nonexperts is relied upon to prove insanity as a defense in a criminal prosecution their opinions may be given, but the facts and circumstances upon which they

3. Such a showing was good, and ought to have been so held, although it appeared by way of counter showing that there were other witnesses, including near relatives, by whom many of the facts within the knowledge of the absent witnesses could have been proved, and although it appeared also that none of the latter had actually seen the accused for some time pre-are based must be stated by the witnesses as a prerequisite to their admissibility. Ellis v. State, 33 Tex. Crim. Rep. 86.

The admissibility of the opinions of nonexpert witnesses as to testamentary capacity in a will contest is a question for the court. Commonwealth Title Ins. & T. Co. v. Gray, 150 Pa. 255.

And it is the duty of the court to decide whether such a knowledge is shown on the part of the nonexpert witness, and such facts are stated as to entitle him to express an opinion as to the sanity of a person accused of crime. Cole v. State, 75 Ind. 513.

In Berry v. State, 10 Ga. 512, however, it was questioned whether it is best to draw a line of demarcation, and to state distinctly in what class of cases the opinions of the witnesses may be embraced, and when they must be excluded.

b. Grounds of admissibility.

The ground upon which the opinions of nonexpert witnesses on the issue of insanity are admitted is that, from the nature of the subject to be investigated, it cannot be so described in language as to enable persons not eye witnesses to form a correct judgment in regard to it. Dewitt v. Barly, 17 N. Y. 840; Culver v. Haslam, 7 Barb. 814.

And the opinions of witnesses in a will contest as to the capacity of a testator are received in evidence because their observation may have conveyed to them little, indefinable, and almost imperceptible actions and perceptions which language cannot adequately describe. Clifton v. Clifton, 47 N. J. Eq. 237.

The admission of opinions in evidence on an issue of insanity is necessary for the reason that it may be impossible to convey to the mind of the jury from the medium of language a distinct idea of the true condition of the party by a statement of the facts alone. Powell v. State, 25 Ala. 81.

And they are admissible when based upon facts and circumstances which from their nature and number it would be impossible to bring before the jury. Pelamouree v. Clark, 9 Iowa, 1.

A nonexpert witness may state facts on the issue of insanity including the looks and actions of the person whose sanity is in question, and it is frequently necessary that he should be permitted to tell what they indicate, or, in other words, be permitted to express an opinion, as he cannot convey to the mind distinctly the condition which such acts and looks betray. Re Vanauken, 10 N. J. Eq. 190.

And the opinions of witnesses on the question of mental soundness derived from observation are admissible in evidence when from the nature of the subject under investigation no better evidence can be obtained. Brown v. Com. 14 Bush, 400.

The opinion of an intelligent nonexpert witness having adequate opportunity of observing and judging as to the mental condition of another is the best testimony which can be adduced, for no mere description of the act, or of words or tone of voice, or glance of the eye, or general expression of the face, or manner or bearing of the person, can convey to the jury the same impressions or indications of insanity or mental debility which they will create in the mind of a competent observer. Appleby v. Brock, 78 Mo. 814.

But nonexpert opinions as to mental capacity vions to the homicide. The main question being whether he was or was not insane when the killing was done, it was his right, not only to put in evidence the facts he could prove by the absent witnesses, but also to have their opinions, based on such facts, passed upon by the jury. This right certainly ought not to have been denied in the present case, there being much evidence for the state to show sanity, and the burden being upon the accused to prove insanity.

4. It is the right of the accused in a criminal case to introduce his witnesses in the order which he or his counsel may deem best; and the fact that a witness is compelled to leave the court for providential cause does not constrain the accused, for the pur-are competent only upon the theory that it is necessary to admit them to get before the jury impressions of witnesses derived from association such as would form the basis of a belief in the mind of a juror if he had had the same opportunity the witnesses had. Smith v. Smith, 117 N. C. 330.

The opinions of witnesses not qualified to speak as experts, when so connected with the res gestæ, and so interwoven therewith, that they inseparably become a part thereof, however, are admissible in evidence in a criminal prosecution on the question of mental capacity, and may be rebutted or explained in the same way as any other legal and competent testimony. United States v. Holmes, 1 Cliff. 98.

II. Exceptions.

a. States adopting different rules.

In Massachusetts experts and subscribing witnesses to wills only are permitted to give opinions upon questions of sanity or mental condition and capacity, and only persons of scientific training upon the subject, and physicians, have been regarded as experts. Com. v. Brayman, 136 Mass. 438.

Opinions on the subject of insanity, as on any other subject, cannot be laid before the jury except by the testimony of persons skilled in such matters. Com. v. Wilson, 1 Gray, 337.

Ordinary witnesses, whatever their opportunities of observation may have been, cannot give mere opinions as to the mental condition of another. Williams v. Spencer, 150 Mass. 346, 5 L. R. A. 790; Cowles v. Merchants, 140 Mass. 377; Com. v. Fairbanks, 2 Allen, 511; Townsend v. Pepperell, 90 Mass. 40; Poole v. Richardson, 3 Mass. 330; Needham v. Ide, 5 Pick. 510.

Nonexpert witnesses are not permitted to state their opinions as to the sanity or insanity of another, even if they first state the facts and circumstances upon which they are founded. Com. v. Wilson, 1 Gray, 337.

And a nonexpert witness in a prosecution for homicide, who has testified as to the appearance and conversation of the accused at certain interviews, cannot be asked to give his opinion therefrom as to his mental condition. Com. v. Wilson, 1 Gray, 339.

In Com. v. Sturdivant, 117 Mass. 122, 19 Am. Rep. 401, however, it was held that nonexpert witnesses having special opportunity for observing may give their opinions as conclusions of fact if the subject-matter upon which their testimony depends cannot be reproduced or described precisely as it appeared to the witness, and the facts upon which his opinion is based are such as men in general are capable of comprehending and understanding, and the question was one of sanity or insanity.

So, in Maine mental incapacity is not to be proved directly by witnesses in the form of an opinion. Hewett v. Hurley, 88 Me. 431.

A question as to how a designated person appeared at a certain date with reference to soundness or unsoundness of mind cannot properly be put except to a medical expert. Wyman v. Gould, 47 Me. 150.

But a nonexpert may state negatively that he did not observe anything peculiar about the mental condition of the person whose sanity is in question. Robinson v. Adams, 62 Me. 309, 16 Am. Rep. 473.

And the opinion of a witness testifying to facts showing incapacity, who had been impeached by proof of declarations made at other times that in his opinion the testator was sane, may be considered with the other evidence in chief as tending to prove capacity. Ware v. Ware, 8 Me. 42.

So, in New Hampshire the rule formerly was the opinions of witnesses who were not experts as to the mental soundness or unsoundness of a person accused of crime were not admissible in evidence in a prosecution therefor. State v. Archer, 54 N. H. 463; State v. Pike, 49 N. H. 399, 6 Am. Rep. 533.

And that the opinions of nonexpert witnesses who were not witnesses to the will, concerning the sanity or insanity of the testator, were not admissible in evidence in a will contest. Boardman v. Woodman, 47 N. H. 120; Hamblett v. Hamblett, 6 N. H. 333.

Witnesses who were not experts could not give their opinions on the question of sanity; they could only describe the appearance and conduct of the party, leaving it to the jury to say what inference should be drawn from the facts described. State v. Pike, 49 N. H. 399, 6 Am. Rep. 533, Doe, J., dissenting.

This rule has been changed, however, and it is now held, that nonexpert witnesses who are not subscribing witnesses to a will may testify as to their opinions in regard to the sanity of the testator when founded upon their knowledge and observation of his appearance and conduct. Hardy v. Merrill, 66 N. H. 227, 22 Am. Rep. 441, overruling previous New Hampshire cases as to that point.

So, in New York a nonexpert witness cannot be asked for his opinion as to the general soundness or unsoundness of mind of a person whose sanity is in question. Brady v. Smith, 8 Misc. 465; People v. Strait, 148 N. Y. 566; Re Folts, 71 Hun. 422; Johnson v. Cochrane, 91 Hun. 165; White v. Davis, 42 N. Y. S. R. 901; Bell v. McMaster, 29 Hun. 272; Hewlett v. Wood, 55 N. Y. 634; Clapp v. Fullerton, 34 N. Y. 190, 90 Am. Dec. 681; O'Brien v. People, 36 N. Y. 276.

Or say whether he was rational or irrational. Johnson v. Cochrane, 91 Hun. 165.

The opinions of nonexpert witnesses are not admissible as evidence on the question of the capacity of another, though given in connection with the facts and circumstances relied on to prove the incapacity, and though the witness had personal acquaintance and intercourse with the party. Dewitt v. Barley, 9 N. Y. 371, Denio, J., dissenting; Holcomb v. Holcomb, 95 N. Y. 316.

And nonexpert witnesses who have testified to the facts tending to show mental unsoundness upon the part of a person cannot give an opinion as to whether such facts so testified to by them indicated such unsoundness. Real v. People, 42 N. Y. 270.

Nor can they give their opinions upon the issue of the sanity or insanity of another, as to his being crazy at any time. Goodell v. Harrington, 3 Thomp. & C. 345.

And they cannot be permitted to state that a person whose sanity is in question acted like a man that was not right, and that he acted queer. White v. Davis, 42 N. Y. S. R. 901.

And they cannot be asked if from their conversation with him, and from his acts, he would say that he was in his right mind, where neither the conversations nor acts had been given in evidence, and the witness's attention was not confined to pose of getting the benefit of his testimony, to put him on the stand at an earlier period of the trial than was otherwise contemplated and intended.

5. In order to render the distinctive defense of insanity available as a basis for an acquittal, the burden is upon the accused to show affirmatively by a preponderance of the evidence introduced at the trial that he was insane at the time the act for which he is indicted was committed. Though this burden may not be successfully carried so as to authorize a verdict of not guilty on this particular ground, it is nevertheless the duty of the jury to consider the evidence touching the alleged insanity in connection with the other evidence in the his apparent rationality or irrationality at the time. Brady v. Smith, 8 Misc. 466.

This rule applies to criminal prosecutions, and a nonexpert witness cannot give his opinion as to whether the accused was insane or delirious; he can only state the facts within his knowledge. O'Brien v. People, 33 N. Y. 276; Real v. People, 42 N. Y. 270.

And the police justice before whom a person accused of crime was brought cannot be asked upon the trial of the prosecution therefor if from what he observed of the defendant he believed he was in a condition to fully comprehend the situation and what was transpiring, where he is not asked for any facts. People v. Fish, 125 N. Y. 136.

So, opinions of witnesses who are nonexperts are not admissible in evidence on a question involving the validity of a deed on the question of the capacity of the grantor, though given in connection with the facts and circumstances relied on to prove the incapacity, and though the witnesses had personal acquaintance and intercourse with the party. Dewitt v. Barley, 9 N. Y. 371; Sears v. Shafer, 1 Barb. 408.

Even when such opinion might be based upon specific acts and conversations and his personal observation. Paine v. Aldrich, 133 N. Y. 544.

The evidence must consist of the acts and declarations of the parties evincing a want of capacity, and it is for the court, and not the witnesses, to form an opinion from the facts. Sears v. Shafer, 1 Barb. 408.

Nor can they be allowed to testify that the mind of an assignor was gone, or that he was imbecile, in an action to set aside an assignment. Holcomb v. Holcomb, 95 N. Y. 816.

And a nonexpert witness in a will contest cannot testify as to the impression made upon him by the acts and sayings of the testator, and as to whether his mind or memory was failing. Lawrence v. Lawrence, 4 N. Y. Week. Dig. 299.

And witnesses in a will contest upon the ground of mental and physical incapacity of the testator cannot state their opinions and conclusions drawn from the testator's acts and motions, but must confine their testimony to the acts and motions themselves. Rollwagen v. Rollwagen, 3 Hun. 121.

Nor can nonexpert witnesses who had been acquainted with and conversed with a testator be asked to state upon the facts to which they had testified, and from what they had observed, what opinion they had formed of his soundness or unsoundness of mind, or as to his being compos mentis or otherwise, and whether in their judgment he was of sound mind and memory. Re Arnold, 14 Hun. 525.

Nor are they competent to testify from the acts and declaration of such testator related and testified to and observed by them, as to what impression they made upon their minds as to his mental condition, the question calling for an opinion which such witnesses are not competent to give. Sisson v. Conger, 1 Thomp. & C. 564.

And an expression of opinion by witnesses in a will contest that a certain act is irrational and indicates unsoundness of mind is not evidence thereof; facts must be given from which it may be judicially determined that the unsoundness of mind existed, before the legal presumption of sanity and of a disposing mind can be overcome. Re Happlee, 66 Hun. 568.

So, a nonexpert witness in a hearing before a commissioner and a jury appointed to inquire as to the unsoundness of mind of a party, who has testified that the party's mind was weak but that he could not call it rational or irrational, cannot be asked to state his impression as to whether such party was failing very fast physically as well as mentally. Re Klook, 49 Hun. 450.

Nonexpert witnesses may testify to facts, declarations, and incidents in relation to the person tending to show soundness or unsoundness of mind, however, and to the impression produced upon them thereby, as to whether the acts and declarations testified to impress them as rational or irrational. People v. Strait, 148 N. Y. 668; Paine v. Aldrich, 133 N. Y. 544; People v. Taylor, 138 N. Y. 396; People v. Conroy, 97 N. Y. 62; Holcomb v. Holcomb, 95 N. Y. 316; Re Ross, 87 N. Y. 514; Rider v. Miller, 86 N. Y. 507; Hewlett v. Wood, 65 N. Y. 684; Clapp v. Fullerton, 84 N. Y. 190, 90 Am. Dec. 681; O'Brien v. People, 33 N. Y. 276; Johnson v. Cochrane, 91 Hun. 165; Re Folts, 71 Hun. 492; Petrie v. Petrie, 2 Silve. S. C. 438; Howell v. Taylor, 11 Hun. 214; Higbee v. Guardian Mut. L. Ins. Co. 66 Barb. 466; White v. Davis, 42 N. Y. S. R. 901; Re Klock, 3 N. Y. Supp. 478.

But they can only state the acts and conversations of which they had personal knowledge. Paine v. Aldrich, 133 N. Y. 544.

And the testimony must be limited to the witness's conclusion from the facts testified to by him. Re Folts, 71 Hun. 492; Re Ross, 87 N. Y. 514; Clapp v. Fullerton, 84 N. Y. 190, 90 Am. Dec. 681.

Thus, a witness in a criminal prosecution who saw the accused just before he had testified that he appeared to be sober but looked as though he had been getting over the effects of a drunk, but answered questions responsively, may, from what he saw and what he heard him say at that time, give an opinion as to whether he was rational or irrational, the testimony relating to the appearance and conduct of the accused and not to the mental condition. People v. Packenham, 115 N. Y. 200.

But the inquiry addressed to a nonexpert witness on the question of sanity or insanity should be, not whether the person was absolutely rational or otherwise, but as to his opinion or impression derived from his acts and conversations at the time; but where it is proved that the witness stated nothing more than his opinion and impressions derived from such acts and conversations, error in admitting evidence as to whether such person was absolutely rational or otherwise will not be deemed prejudicial. People v. Youngs, 151 N. Y. 210.

So, a question addressed to a nonexpert witness in a will contest, as to whether he ever saw the testator act rational from a designated date until the last time he saw him, though properly inadmissible is not a ground for a reversal where it appears to the appellate court that the result would have been the same if the testimony had been excluded. Johnson v. Cochrane, 91 Hun. 166.

And while nonexpert witnesses are not allowed to give their opinions upon the general question of a person's sanity or insanity the admission in evidence in a will contest of a deposition taken in another state containing such evidence is not error where the parties had agreed that they would not object to evidence taken under the commission except as noted on the return, and no objections are noted to such evidence. Re Bull, 2 N. Y. Supp. 52, 14 Daly, 510.

case, and then, in view of it all, determine whether or not a reasonable doubt of the guilt of the accused exists in their minds.

6. In instructing the jury as to the nature of expert and nonexpert testimony, and explaining the rules under which witnesses belonging to each class might give their opinions as to the sanity or insanity of the

So, inquiries by the proponent of a will of the contestant's witnesses examined for the purpose of proving facts exhibiting the bodily and mental condition of the testator as to whether or not he appeared or acted rational do not fall within the province of mere cross-examination. Rollwagen v. Rollwagen, 5 Thomp. & C. 402.

And witnesses in a will contest who have testified to acts and conduct of the testator and their intercourse with him, and that their impression was that he was rational, cannot be asked on cross-examination if, had they known of his breaking out in prayer meeting with obscene language, wanting to go to an infants' school after he was seventy years of age, and claiming to be in love with a young girl, that knowledge would have influenced the impression received by them, where none of them testified to such facts, though they appeared in the evidence of other witnesses. Bell v. McMaster, 20 Hun, 272.

But evidence in a prosecution for homicide of the brother of the accused as to whether he would regard the actions of the accused as irrational, if he were nervous and irritable after divorce papers had been served upon him, is admissible as tending to characterize and develop the weight to be given the evidence given by him on his direct examination. People v. Osmond, 138 N. Y. 80.

For cross-examination with relation to opinion evidence under the general rule, see infra, IX.

In De Witt v. Barly, 17 N. Y. 840, a departure from the above rule was made, and it was held that an unprofessional witness might give his opinion in regard to the mental imbecility of another, confined to facts alone founded upon personal observation of his appearance and conduct.

And this rule was reasserted in Culver v. Haslam, 7 Barb. 314.

And in Gardiner v. Gardiner, 84 N. Y. 155, it was held that the testimony of a nonexpert witness in a will contest as to what he thought of the capacity of the testatrix to do business is not objectionable as calling for the opinion of the witness as to the testamentary capacity of the testatrix, as it is directed to her capacity for business only, and does not necessarily establish or deny her testamentary capacity.

In De Witt v. Barly, 17 N. Y. 840, the former decision in the same case reported in 9 N. Y. 371, set forth supra, was limited and explained and said to be authoritative only for the doctrine that upon a trial involving the question of mental imbecility a nonprofessional witness cannot be asked the broad question whether he considered the party non compos mentis or incapable of managing his affairs, and that though the abstract question whether opinions can be received at all was elaborately discussed, it was not before the court in its broad aspect.

But it will be seen by the long line of decisions subsequently made on the question set forth above that the rule therein laid down is not now regarded as law, or at least that it is too broadly stated.

So, in Hickman v. State, 38 Tex. 190, it was said that in the opinion of the court it would be better practice as a general rule to confine nonexpert witnesses to a statement of those demonstrations which indicate insanity, and leave the jury to form their own opinion as to the cause; but that in the case at hand facts proved rendered the ruling of 38 L. R. A.

accused, it was error to charge that the testimony of expert witnesses was entitled to great weight, and to add: "The same way with parties who associated with defendant, lived with him, lived in the same community," etc. It is safer and better to leave all these matters to be weighed by the jury, and to let them determine the probative value of the testimony of each witness.

the court quite immaterial, as other evidence in the case clearly established the fact of sanity.

It will be seen, however, by examination of the Texas cases set forth supra, I. that the contrary rule is established in that state.

b. Privilege of witness.

Indiana Rev. Stat. 1881, § 496, prohibiting certain persons from testifying against a deceased person, applies to cases where a claim is asserted against a decedent's estate, or where a claim asserted by the representative of the decedent is resisted; but does not prohibit heirs from testifying in a suit to set aside a will as to the mental capacity of the testator, although his executor is a party to the action. Lamb v. Lamb, 106 Ind. 454.

So, the trustee in a deed of trust and the party whose debt is secured thereby are not competent, under W. Va. Code, chap. 130, § 23, subd. 2, to testify in an action to set aside the deed, as to their opinions of the soundness of mind of the grantor, basing their opinions upon his conduct and conversations at and before the time of its execution. Auderson v. Cramer, 11 W. Va. 562.

But the testimony of a daughter of a person who had made a promissory note to take effect after death, in an action upon the note, that she had known him and lived with him all her life, and had seen him make contracts, and saw him after he returned after the note in suit was executed, and that his mind was bright and he had in her opinion mental capacity sufficient to make a contract, is not inadmissible under N. C. Code, § 540, as testimony in relation to a present transaction or communication with him. Ducker v. Whitson, 112 N. C. 44.

And neither of the litigants in a will contest can be permitted to invoke the rule respecting privileged communication for the purpose of excluding material and important evidence by a witness who had been the attorney for the testator, where such evidence is necessary as a basis for the witness's opinion as to his mental condition, and the disclosures in no way reflect upon his character or reputation, and the testimony when given serves to protect the estate and aid in the proper disposition of it. Re Layman, 40 Minn. 371.

And the opinion of a contestant of a will as to the mental capacity of the testator is admissible in evidence on a contest of the will where it is based upon observation and facts independent of any conversation or communication with the testator. Re Goldthorp, 94 Iowa, 336.

So, legatees under a will are not incompetent witnesses as to the mental capacity of the testatrix as parties to the issue. Foster v. Dickerson, 64 Vt. 233.

And a legatee under a will in giving his opinion as to the mental condition of a testator may testify in an action to set it aside as to the conduct and conversation of the testator in his family. Burkhart v. Gladish, 123 Ind. 333.

And evidence in a will contest given by a testator's counsel, that the testator was too imbecile to make communications to him, is not incompetent within the rule that communications between client and counsel are privileged. Daniel v. Daniel, 89 Pa. 191.

But testimony by attorneys as to conversations had with them by a testator at the time of giving

7. There was, in the present case, no violation of the well-settled rule that nonexpert witnesses may testify to their opinions concerning the sanity or insanity of a given person, it appearing that in each instance where objection was made to testimony of this kind the witness had stated sufficient reasons as the foundation of his opinion to render it proper for the same to be heard and passed upon by the jury.

8. When a juror who has qualified upon his voir dire is put upon the judge as a trior, the latter, in the absence of any extrinsic evidence impeaching or attacking the juror's competency, is not required to enter upon an investigation as to the same; and in no event is the court bound to ask, or to permit counsel to ask, the juror any question the answer to which would tend to incriminate or disgrace him. The instructions for the will offered for probate and another will previously drawn, is incompetent as in violation of the New York prohibition against disclosing communications made by a client to his attorney under sanction of professional employment. Re Coleman, 111 N. Y. 220.

So, the observation of a legatee under a will as to the demeanor, gait, expression, or appearance of the testator is not a personal transaction with the deceased which will render her evidence inadmissible upon a will contest under Iowa Code, § 3639, excluding such transactions. Denning v. Butcher, 91 Iowa, 425.

And a witness in an action to set aside a deed, who has testified to the grantor's want of mental capacity to make a deed, and that her opinion was formed from conversations and communications between them, is not thereby rendered incompetent to prove such conversations and communications in order that the jury might see whether the opinion was well founded, by a statutory provision forbidding a witness who has a legal or equitable interest which may be affected by the event of the action to be examined in regard to any transaction or communication between such witness and a person at the time of such examination deceased, insane, or lunatic, as the conversations are offered, not to prove any fact stated or implied, but the mental condition of the party, and the declarations are not received to show the truth of the things declared, but as evidence of a disordered intellect of which they are the outward manifestations. McLeary v. Norment, 84 N. C. 235.

A request by a testator to his attorney to sign his will as a subscribing witness, however, is a waiver of objection to his competency which leaves him free to perform the duties of a witness and testify to any matter in relation to the will and its execution, of which he acquired knowledge by virtue of his personal relation, including the mental condition of the testator at the time. McMaster v. Scriven, 85 Wis. 162; Re Coleman, 111 N. Y. 220; Denning v. Butcher, 91 Iowa, 425.

And an executor may waive such privilege. Denning v. Butcher, 91 Iowa, 425.

Under the New York statute, however, it is held, with reference to expert witnesses, that the privilege of the witness cannot be waived by an executor or administrator. Westover v. Aetna L. Ins. Co., 99 N. Y. 55, 53 Am. Rep. 1.

III. What constitutes opinion evidence.

The impression made upon the mind of a witness by the conduct, manner, bearing, conversations, appearance, and acts of a testator in various business transactions for a long series of years is not mere opinion which is inadmissible in evidence in a will contest; it is knowledge and strictly analogous to cases of personal identity and handwriting. Townsend v. Townsend, 7 Gill, 10.

And sanity being the normal condition, while insanity is abnormal, when it is once shown that a witness has a sufficient acquaintance with a person alleged to be insane to give a reasonable opportunity for judging, he may testify that he saw nothing unusual or abnormal, without stating the circumstances upon which his opinion is based. People v. Borgetto, 99 Mich. 336.

Or he may state that he did not observe anything peculiar about his mental condition. Robinson v. Adams, 62 Me. 399, 18 Am. Rep. 473.

And evidence as to the peculiar conduct and language of a party whose sanity is in question is admissible though the witnesses giving it are not experts and are not intimate acquaintances within the meaning of Cal. Code Civ. Proc. § 1870, subd. 10. Marceau v. Travelers' Ins. Co., 101 Cal. 388.

And evidence as to the feeling manifested by a testator towards his brother is of fact rather than an opinion, and is admissible in a will contest as bearing upon the question of the testator's insanity. Pelamoures v. Clark, 9 Iowa, 1.

So, the right to testify as to whether a person appeared to be rational or irrational is not confined to expert witnesses and intimate acquaintances, as this does not constitute giving an opinion as to his mental sanity, but is the statement of an open patent fact indicated to all alike. Holland v. Zollner, 102 Cal. 635.

And a witness in a prosecution for assault with intent to kill who was present at the time may testify as to the appearance of the defendant with reference to his being rational or irrational, though he is not shown to have been an intimate acquaintance. People v. Lavelle, 71 Cal. 351; People v. McCarthy, 115 Cal. 255.

And a person who has engaged in a business transaction with another whose sanity is in question may be asked how he conducted himself in such transaction, as the question does not call for an opinion as to his sanity, but for a statement of his conduct and appearance. Re Wax, 108 Cal. 843.

So, nonexpert witnesses other than subscribing witnesses to a will may testify on the contest thereof to the appearance of the testator, and to any particular facts from which the state of his mind might be inferred. Poole v. Richardson, 3 Mass. 380.

And a witness in an action involving the validity of a deed in which insanity is alleged may be asked whether from his general appearance he considered the grantor capable of making a contract or transacting important business, the question as to what his appearance was being subject to inquiry by either party. Wilkinson v. Pearson, 23 Pa. 117.

And evidence in a will contest that the testator acted strangely or in a childish manner may be given by anyone without stating facts upon which the opinion is based. Parsons v. Parsons, 66 Iowa, 754.

A nonexpert witness in a will contest may testify to impressions produced upon him by what he witnessed, but he is not legally competent, under the New York practice, to express an opinion on the general question whether the mind of the testator was sound or unsound. Clapp v. Fullerton, 84 N. Y. 190, 90 Am. Dec. 681.

So, a question in a will contest in which insanity is alleged, as to whether or not the testator was an eccentric man, is not objectionable as calling for a conclusion instead of a fact. Fraser v. Jennison, 42 Mich. 208.

And evidence by a nonexpert witness in a will contest that he observed no incoherence of thought in the testator, or anything unusual or singular with respect to his mental condition, is admissible, as it is not the giving of an opinion as to the condiscope of the inquiry in such matters is to be left largely in the discretion of the trial judge.

9. The court in some of its instructions referred to the homicide as "the act which the accused had committed," and thus at least intimated an opinion that the killing was done by him; and, although many of the requests to charge practically conceded that this was true, yet, as it was not distinctly admitted that the accused did commit the homicide, expressions embracing such language as that above quoted should not have been used.

10. The instructions as to the law of insanity were, in the main, correct, and appropriate, and the charge as a whole, except as above indicated, was free from material error.

tion of his mind, but only a statement of its manifestation as observed by him. Nash v. Hunt, 116 Mass. 237.

And questions asked the plaintiff in an action involving the validity of a paper signed by him calling for a description of his physical and mental and nervous condition at the time are not objectionable as calling for the opinion of the witness as to his mental condition. O'Brien v. Chicago, M. & St. P. R. Co. 89 Iowa, 644.

So, evidence is competent on behalf of the contestants of a will that a testator a short time before making the will was insensible and unconscious of what was going on around him, and that he was prostrated by sickness and did not appear to know an intimate acquaintance, and that efforts to converse with him proved ineffectual, such evidence not being a mere matter of opinion, but matters of fact combining many minute particulars. Halley v. Webster, 21 Me. 461.

And testimony of a widow of a deceased person whose sanity is in question as to what was the condition of her husband's health up to the time of his death, is not objectionable as calling for a mere opinion upon a matter as to which she was not an expert, as it merely calls for her knowledge and observation as a matter of fact. Higbee v. Guardian Mut. L. Ins. Co. 68 Barb. 486.

So, any witness of ordinary intelligence who is familiarly acquainted with another may testify whether within a given time he has failed mentally or physically. Com. v. Brayman, 136 Mass. 438.

And a nonexpert witness in a will contest who had been guardian of the testator for many years while he was under guardianship as an insane person may be asked whether he had ever observed any facts which led him to infer that there was any derangement of intellect on the part of the testator. May v. Bradlee, 127 Mass. 414.

And an executor in a will who was not an expert, who had several interviews with the testator, may be asked the same question. McConnell v. Wildes, 153 Mass. 457.

And permitting a witness to add to his negative answers to certain questions put to him in regard to whether he had made certain statements about the mental condition of the testator in a will contest, "because I never thought of such a thing as his not being sane," and "because it was not true," furnishes no ground for exception. Nash v. Hunt, 116 Mass. 237.

So, the character and quality of the defendant's mind, as to whether it is weak or strong, is a material fact in a prosecution for homicide in which the defense was insanity. People v. Worthington, 105 Cal. 160.

And the question whether there was an apparent change in a man's intelligence or understanding, or a want of coherence in his remarks, is a matter, not of opinion, but of fact, as to which any witness who has had an opportunity to observe him may testify. Barker v. Comins, 110 Mass. 477.

And a nonexpert witness may be asked whether he noticed any difference in the mode of doing business of a person whose sanity is in question at that time and at a previous time. Com. v. Brayman, 136 Mass. 438.

But a nonexpert witness who was not an attesting witness, who had known him many years and had testified in a will contest upon an issue of the soundness of mind of the testator, that he began to fail about twenty years before, and had failed mentally and physically, and that he had noticed a decided change in his intelligence, cannot be asked whether from his general appearance he considered him capable of making a contract or of transacting important business. Smith v. Smith, 157 Mass. 339.

So, a nonexpert witness in a will contest, who had testified that he saw the testator shortly before and again after he had been prostrated by a shock of paralysis which was alleged to have caused his incompetency, cannot be asked what were his condition and appearance as regarding his conduct and conversation at the latter interview as compared with his conduct and conversation at the former interview, as it might be understood by the witness as calling for his opinion as to the mental condition of the testator. Ellis v. Ellis, 133 Mass. 469.

And a statement by a witness that a wife treated her husband as a parent would a child is inadmissible to prove the insanity of the husband, being ambiguous and a mere expression of opinion. Waters v. Waters, 35 Md. 531.

Error in excluding evidence upon the issue of the sanity of a party at the time of making a promissory note, as to whether he talked coherently or incoherently, is rendered immaterial where the witness was subsequently allowed to tell how he talked and acted. Hodges v. Scott, 118 Mass. 520.

IV. Who may give.

The general rule is that anyone who had an opportunity of knowing and observing a person whose sanity is impeached may give an opinion as to his mental capacity, whether he was an attesting witness or not. Doe, McDougald, v. McLean, Winst. L. pt. 1, p. 120.

This rule applies to persons who were parties to the suit where parties are permitted to testify. Severin v. Zack, 55 Iowa, 23.

And a legatee under a will is a competent witness in an action to set aside the will, as to the mental condition of the testator, and not being an expert he may be required to state the facts upon which such opinion is based. Staser v. Hogan, 120 Ind. 227; Burkhardt v. Gladish, 123 Ind. 333; Denning v. Butcher, 91 Iowa, 425.

So, the contestants of a will are competent to testify in the will contest as to the conduct, conversation, and character of the testator as bearing upon the question of his mental capacity. Williams v. Williams, 90 Ky. 23.

And an opinion may be expressed by a caveatrix as to the sanity of a testatrix. Dennis v. Weekes, 51 Ga. 24.

And the guardian of a testatrix is a competent witness to prove her capacity to make a will. Howard v. Coke, 7 B. Mon. 655.

And a brother of a testator has been permitted to give his opinion as to his mental capacity upon a proper showing of intimacy. Weems v. Weems, 19 Md. 334.

And so has a daughter. Moore v. Moore, 67 Mo. 192.

So, a wife may testify as to the mental condition of her husband, and give an opinion as to his sanity, when accompanied by a statement of facts upon which it is based. Haney v. Clark, 65 Tex. 93; Denning v. Butcher, 91 Iowa, 425.

And the wife of a party to a settlement may give her opinion as to whether or not he comprehended it in an action involving its validity, where she gives a detailed account of his habits of life before and after the paralysis claimed to have rendered him incompetent, stating how he became changed in his acts, conduct, and disposition by his sickness. Burnham v. Mitchell, 84 Wis. 117.

And the divorced wife of a person accused of crime may testify as to whether from her association with him she ever saw anything that would indicate that he was a man of unsound mind without violating the rule which protects the privacy and confidence of the marriage relation. United States v. Guiteau, 1 Mackey, 493, 47 Am. Rep. 247.

So, an administrator who had been the family physician of a testator for years may testify as a witness for himself on the trial of an application to sell lands for the payment of debts in which the issue was the validity of a promissory note signed by the intestate, as to the general insanity of the intestate, and state the facts upon which his opinion is founded; but under Ala. Code, § 3068, forbidding testimony as to any transaction with or statement by the deceased, he cannot state what was the condition of his mind at the time the note was given. Davis v. Tarver, 65 Ala. 98.

It has been held, however, that one who would inherit a part of a testator's property but for his will is incompetent to give his opinion as to his capacity to make it. Kerr v. Lunsford, 81 W. Va. 690, 2 L. R. A. 688.

And the daughters of a testator are not competent witnesses on their own behalf to prove the insanity of their father at and prior to the time he executed his last will and testament, upon a bill in equity to contest its validity. Brace v. Black, 125 Ill. 33.

So, the previously expressed opinion of the person killed is not admissible in evidence on the question of the sanity of the accused upon a prosecution for such killing. Lake v. People, 1 Park. Crim. Rep. 495.

And the plaintiff in an action for a personal injury, who testifies that he fell from a building and was severely injured, is not competent to testify as to the effect of the injury upon his mind, or to give an opinion upon the question of the soundness or unsoundness of his own mind. O'Connell v. Beecher, 21 App. Div. 296.

V. Acquaintance necessary.

a. General rules.

It is impossible to lay down any precise rule as to the length or character of the acquaintance which will render the opinion of a witness admissible on the issue of sanity or insanity. Powell v. State, 25 Ala. 21.

It is generally stated that nonexpert witnesses may testify as to their opinions upon the question of the sanity or insanity of another where there has been long and intimate acquaintance to enable them to form a correct judgment as to the mental condition of such person. Burney v. Torrey, 100 Ala. 157; Fountain v. Brown, 38 Ala. 72; Polin v. State, 14 Neb. 540; Culver v. Haslam, 7 Barb. 814.

And where they formed their opinions from facts within their own knowledge. Polin v. State, 14 Neb. 540; Culver v. Haslam, 7 Barb. 814.

And that persons personally acquainted for a long time with another may give their opinions as to his sanity in evidence, though they are not professional persons. Phelps v. Com. 17 Ky. L. Rep. 706; Cotrell v. Com. 13 Ky. L. Rep. 305.

12. Except as pointed out in the preceding notes, there was no substantial error at the trial relating to any matter or question which can arise when the case is tried again, and therefore it is unnecessary to deal specifically with a large majority of the seventy-two grounds of the motion for a new trial.

Within this rule a nonexpert witness who is well acquainted with another may give his opinion as to whether or not he was a person of feeble mind, based upon facts to which he had testified. Mills v. Winter, 94 Ind. 320.

And he may be asked his opinion from the facts stated by him as to the health and mental condition of the party. Price v. Richmond & D. R. Co. 38 S. C. 199.

And a nonexpert witness who knew the person whose sanity was in question well and for a long time may give an opinion as to the state of his mind during certain periods, and at the time of the transactions in question. State v. Ketcher, 70 N. C. 621; State v. Maier, 36 W. Va. 757; Schlencker v. State, 9 Neb. 241.

And nonexpert witnesses may give their opinions as to the sanity or insanity of a person accused of crime, where they state as a reason for their opinions that they are well acquainted with him and had observed his conduct during the period in regard to which they testified. Territory v. Roberts, 9 Mont. 12.

So, the rule has been stated that nonexperts having favorable opportunities for ascertaining by observation the facts may testify as to their opinion respecting the sanity or insanity of another. State v. Bryant, 98 Mo. 273; Jamison v. People, 145 Ill. 357; Keithley v. Stafford, 126 Ill. 507; Reed v. State, 62 Miss. 408; Woodcock v. Johnson, 36 Minn. 217; Clary v. Clary, 2 Ired. L. 73; Com. v. Gerade, 145 Pa. 289.

Within the rule as thus stated, witnesses in a will contest who had known the testatrix personally, and had opportunities to frequently observe her, may be asked to state from what they saw of her and from their interviews with her what they should say as to her soundness of mind. Shanley's Appeal, 62 Conn. 335; Wise v. Foote, 81 Ky. 10; State v. Potts, 100 N. C. 457; Doe, McDougald, v. McLean, 1 Winsl. L. pt. 1, p. 120.

But a nonexpert witness cannot give his opinion as to the sanity or insanity of a person based on actual observation, where he has no particular acquaintance with him. State v. Crisp, 128 Mo. 505.

Or but a mere passing acquaintance. Grand Lodge, I. O. of M. A. v. Weiting, 168 Ill. 408.

Or where they appear to have had no opportunities for forming an opinion. Holcomb v. State, 41 Tex. 125.

The opinion of a witness upon the question of the competency of a testator is admissible only when it appears that the witness was sufficiently acquainted with him to be able to form an opinion. O'Connor v. Madison, 98 Mich. 183.

And where the witness has had adequate opportunity to observe the conduct or appearance of the party to whom insanity is imputed, and whose judgment is based upon personal observation of his appearance, habits, manner, and conduct. Taylor v. United States, 7 App. D. C. 27; Turner v. Kansas City, St. J. & C. B. R. Co. 23 Mo. App. 12.

To render the opinion of a nonexpert witness admissible on an issue of mental soundness the circumstances must have been such as to have afforded the witness an opportunity of forming an accurate judgment as to the existence or nonexistence of mental disease considered with reference to the character or degree in which it is alleged to exist. Powell v. State, 25 Ala. 21.

And while the opinions of nonexpert witnesses are admissible in a criminal prosecution on the question of the sanity of the accused the court must be satisfied before admitting them that they had opportunity by association and observation to form an opinion as to the sanity of such person. Brown v. Com., 14 Bush. 400.

Witnesses who are not medical experts should be required to show that their acquaintance with the testatrix had been sufficiently intimate and long to justify the formation of a correct judgment as to her mental status and habits, before testifying as to the condition of her mind at the time of making her will. Moore v. Spier, 80 Ala. 129.

The opinion of a witness upon the question of the competency of a testator is admissible only when it appears that the witness was sufficiently acquainted with him to be able to form an opinion, and the court may properly require him to state all the circumstances upon which his opinion is based before permitting him to state it. O'Connor v. Madison, 98 Mich. 188.

And the acquaintance with another which will qualify a witness on an inquisition of lunacy who is not a physician to give his opinion as to his sanity or insanity in connection with the facts upon which it was based must be something more than mere occasional brief interviews on general or indifferent subjects; it must be one which will enable him to affirm with some confidence that he has knowledge of the intellectual workings and mental states of the person in question. Re Carmichael, 36 Ala. 514.

The opinions of witnesses in connection with the facts on an issue as to mental capacity, however, are admissible in evidence where it is apparent that those who were called upon to testify occupied a position toward the person alleged to be insane which enabled them to form a correct judgment as to his mental condition. Powell v. State, 25 Ala. 21; Ford v. State, 71 Ala. 385; Thomas v. State, 40 Tex. 60; Wood v. State, 58 Miss. 741.

And they may not only depose to facts conducing to establish the unsoundness of his mind, but also give their opinions in connection with such facts as to his sanity or insanity. Florey v. Florey, 24 Ala. 241; Norris v. State, 16 Ala. 778.

And the opinions as to the mental capacity of a person, of those who from habits or daily or common intercourse with or observation of him can make an intelligent comparison of the mental manifestations with his conduct when he enjoyed the full use of his natural faculties, are competent evidence when the facts upon which they are founded are given. Beller v. Jones, 22 Ark. 92.

But the acquaintance of nonexpert witnesses with the person whose mental condition is in question need not be extensive or intimate; it is enough if it is such as to enable the witness to form some opinion, the value of the opinion depending upon the facts upon which it rests. Johnson v. Culver, 116 Ind. 278.

And if a nonexpert witness in a criminal prosecution in which the question of insanity is involved shows, by way of acquaintance with the accused that he has had conversations with him or business dealings or social intercourse, or any other material facts warranting an inference that he has sufficient knowledge to form an opinion, it is the duty of the court to permit the opinion to go to the jury for whatever it may be worth. Goodwin v. State, 96 Ind. 550.

So, the term "intimate acquaintance" as used in Oregon Civil Code, § 606, providing that the opinion of an intimate acquaintance respecting the mental sanity of a person may be given where the reason for the opinion is given, requires that the witness should be more than a casual and ordinary acquaintance, and requires close friendship and familiarity. State v. Murray, 11 Or. 413.

And the opinion of a nonprofessional witness in a criminal prosecution concerning the sanity or insanity of the accused, and as to whether his conduct at the time of the commission of the crime was that of a rational man, is not admissible unless the witness is an intimate acquaintance and the reason for his opinion is given. State v. Murray, 11 Or. 413.

And Cal. Code Civ. Proc. § 1870, making competent the opinion of an intimate acquaintance respecting the mental sanity of a person, excludes all evidence of others than intimate acquaintances who are by unreserved intercourse familiar with the varying moods and temperament of the person whose soundness is questioned. Carpenter v. Bailey, 94 Cal. 406.

But a witness in a will contest may be permitted to give his opinion as to the mental capacity of the testator where there was considerable evidence on the question of his intimate acquaintance with him, though the showing of intimacy was not very strong. Carpenter v. Bailey, 79 Cal. 382.

The same degree of intimacy is not necessary to render the opinion of a witness admissible on the question of the mental condition of another in case of general insanity, where there is total incapacity to distinguish right from wrong on any question as in cases of monomania or partial derangement. Powell v. State, 25 Ala. 21.

And the objection that a person called upon for an opinion as to the sanity or insanity of another is not an intimate acquaintance is not avoided by varying the form of the question and asking the witness how such person appeared mentally. Carpenter v. Bailey, 94 Cal. 406.

And if the witness is an intimate acquaintance his opinion is admissible though he did not in express words state the fact of such intimate acquaintance. Farley v. Parker, 6 Or. 106, 25 Am. Rep. 504.

b. Application in particular cases.

1. In criminal proceedings.

Nonexpert witnesses may give their opinions upon the question of the sanity of the accused in a criminal prosecution where they were acquainted with him and had seen him frequently and under different circumstances, and their opinions were founded upon such acquaintance and knowledge. State v. Hayden, 51 Vt. 226.

That a witness had an acquaintance with the accused in a prosecution for homicide, and had had conversation with him or had had business dealings or social intercourse with him, is sufficient to justify the expression of an opinion as to his sanity. Goodwin v. State, 96 Ind. 550.

And a proper predicate for the admission of the opinions of nonexpert witnesses in a criminal prosecution in which insanity is interposed as a defense is made where they are shown to have had an intimate acquaintance with the defendant for Blackman v. State, 80 Ga. 785; Hunter v. State, 43 Ga. 519; 1 Bishop, Crim. Proc. 8d ed. § 70; Kerr, Homicide, 882; Johnson v. Com. 82 Ky. 116; 8 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law, pp. 96, 97, and notes; 4 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law, p. 118.

The court committed error in overruling the years and up to the time of the criminal act. State v. Hurst (Idaho) 89 Pac. 564.

So, a nonexpert witness in a criminal prosecution who had known the accused for fifteen years and met and observed him almost daily for six weeks immediately preceding the commission of the offense, his attention being particularly directed to his mental condition, is admissible upon the question of his sanity. Pfueger v. State, 46 Neb. 493.

And a witness in a criminal case who testifies that she has been acquainted with the defendant for two years, and that she lived near her and had frequently seen her at work, and when she passed the witness's house, sufficiently qualifies herself to give her opinion as to the defendant's sanity or insanity. Sage v. State, 91 Ind. 141.

And a witness who was acquainted with a person accused of crime, and who had conversed with him twice or more during the year just previous to its commission, is competent to give evidence as to his opinion as to whether the prisoner was entirely insane and could not distinguish right from wrong, though he would not be competent to testify as to the mere existence of an insane delusion. Powell v. State, 25 Ala. 31.

So, a nonexpert witness in a criminal prosecution who had known the defendant for about four months prior to the criminal act, and saw him every day during the latter part of that time, and sat at the same table and ate with him once or twice and noticed him and observed his manner of speech and conversation, and saw him the evening before the act, and went with him to a neighboring village on the morning after it, and had considerable conversation with him on the way, is qualified to form and express an opinion as to his sanity or insanity. State v. Lewis, 20 Nev. 363.

But evidence that a nonexpert witness had known the accused in a criminal prosecution for five or six years, and that he had seen him often on the street but that he had not worked with him, does not show sufficient information to warrant his giving an opinion as to the sanity or insanity of the accused. Shaeffer v. State, 61 Ark. 241.

And it has been held that only such intimate acquaintances of the accused in a criminal prosecution as have seen him almost daily for several months preceding the alleged crime are competent as nonexpert witnesses to testify as to his sanity or insanity. Shults v. State, 37 Neb. 481.

So, a witness who arrested a person accused of crime, taking him some distance and turning him over to the authorities, cannot testify as to whether he saw anything in the conduct, appearance, manner, or conversation of the accused that indicated that he appreciated the character of his act. Bolling v. State, 54 Ark. 538.

But the opinion of the jailer who had charge of the person accused of crime, as to his sanity or insanity, may be given in evidence though he had no previous acquaintance with him, where it was formed upon his subsequent acquaintance with and knowledge of the accused, acquired during several months that the latter remained under his charge, rather than upon his mere appearance when he was first brought to the jail, and he had an excellent opportunity, of which he availed himself, to acquire an intimate knowledge and form an intelligent judgment as to his mental condition. People v. McCarthy, 115 Cal. 256.

And the rule is the same with reference to an 38 L. R. A. motion of the plaintiff in error to continue the case.

Copenhagen v. State, 14 Ga. 22; Maddox v. State, 32 Ga. 581, 79 Am. Dec. 307; Bishop v. State, 9 Ga. 121; 1 Bishop, Crim. L. 7th ed. p. 377, note 2; Coz v. State, 64 Ga. 408, 37 officer who had charge of the prisoner for four months prior to the trial. State v. Feister (Or.) 50 Pac. 561.

The question whether the evidence of the sheriff who took the defendant into custody the day after a murder committed by him that in his opinion he was perfectly sane on that day, where he had known him for five or six years and saw him every month or so, is admissible upon a prosecution for the homicide, is within the discretion of the court, and will not be reversed except in case of abuse. State v. Hansen, 25 Or. 391.

A nonexpert witness in a criminal prosecution cannot give his opinion as to the sanity of the accused, however, where it is not shown that he knew anything in regard to his condition except what he learned as foreman of the jury by which he was previously tried. State v. Klinger, 46 Mo. 224.

And a witness is not qualified to give an opinion as to the sanity of the defendant in a criminal prosecution by testimony that he presided as district judge during a former trial of the offense and observed him during that and the present trial, and that he examined his eyes as he sat in court, and that he had been a good deal with insane persons and noticed their eyes and observed their difference from ordinary eyes. McLeod v. State, 31 Tex. Crim. Rep. 331.

Or by proof that he was on the grand jury after the indictment was found, and that the grand jury visited the jail, and that he called the defendant out of his cell and asked him some questions and felt of his head and took some interest in him and afterwards went back to see him. State v. Klinger, 46 Mo. 224.

So, a witness on a prosecution for homicide who has described the appearance of the defendant and claimed to have heard her talk, but to have paid little attention to what she said, and does not undertake to detail it, cannot be asked to give his opinion from her appearance and conversation as to whether she was of sound mind. State v. Stickley, 41 Iowa, 232.

And a nonexpert witness in a criminal case cannot give her opinion as to the mental condition of the defendant from what she saw of him during the week preceding the criminal act and from her conversation with him, where it does not appear how long she had known him or how frequently she had seen him, or that she had ever seen him at all before that week. Taylor v. United States, 7 App. D. C. 27.

And witnesses in a prosecution for homicide are not competent to express an opinion as to the prisoner's mental condition at the time of the act when for months they had not seen him, merely because on some occasions when they had seen him he gave evidence of mental unsoundness, where his mental aberrations were fitful or rare, and in the interval his mind was lucid. Com. v. Buccieri, 153 Pa. 535.

2. In civil actions.

Persons who grew up with a testator, and who marked his conduct in infancy, in the prime of life and in his decline, may give their opinions as to his sanity or insanity in a proceeding involving the validity of his will, where they state the grounds of their opinions. Rambler v. Tryon, 7 Serg. & R. 90, 10 Am. Dec. 444.

And evidence that persons were intimately acquainted with a testator, and that they had frequent and friendly intercourse with him and abundant opportunity to observe his condition and note the changes in it during the last year of his life, furnishes a sufficient foundation to justify them in expressing their opinion with respect to his sanity. Commonwealth Title Ins. & T. Co. v. Gray, 150 Pa. 255.

So, acquaintance with the testatrix before and after a time when she had a severe sickness, and opportunities to see her after that time and observe what changes there were in her conduct and appearance, are facts of the highest significance with relation to the question of her soundness or unsoundness of mind which will warrant the giving of an opinion where the question was not the simple one of mental unsoundness, but mental unsoundness beginning at a certain time and indicated by certain changes in her appearance and conduct. Shanley's Appeal, 62 Conn. 325.

And a witness on the contested probate of a will who had known the testator from childhood and been intimate with him may give his opinion as to the latter's mental status generally, though he saw but little of him during the two or three months immediately preceding the execution of the will. Stubbs v. Houston, 38 Ala. 555.

And the opinions of neighbors who had known a testator for many years, and who had been in the habit of visiting him and were acquainted with his former condition, and could mark the change at the time of their interview with him, are admissible in a will contest upon the question of testamentary capacity. Swails v. White, 149 Pa. 261.

And neighbors of a testator who had known him well for twenty-five years, and had often had dealings with him, and would never have hesitated to buy from or sell to him, may give their opinions in a proceeding to contest his will that he was of sound and disposing mind and capable of executing a valid deed or contract during the period of their acquaintance with him. Townshend v. Townshend, 7 Gill, 10.

So, a nonexpert witness in a will contest, who testifies that he has long known the testator and was a neighbor and had often dealt with him and conversed with him both before and after the execution of his will, is competent to give an opinion as to his soundness of mind. Ryman v. Crawford, 86 Ind. 265.

And so is a witness who has been intimately acquainted with a testator for thirteen years, and has frequently been at his house for weeks together. Florey v. Florey, 24 Ala. 241.

And witnesses who were more or less intimate with the testator for many years before his death may testify to their knowledge of his business and social acts, and express their opinion as to his mental condition on the question of testamentary capacity. Brooks's Estate, 54 Cal. 471.

So, the opinions of nonexpert witnesses who knew a testator intimately, and who approached him on matters of business as to his mental capacity, are admissible in a will contest. Fishburne v. Ferguson, 84 Va. 87.

And a daughter of a grantor who knew the habits and state of mind of her father and often heard him speak of business affairs may be asked to state, in an action to set aside his deed upon the ground of mental incapacity, if he talked sensibly or otherwise, and the condition of his mind at about the time of making the deed. Moore v. Moore, 67 Mo. 192.

And the brother of a testator with whom he had been engaged in conducting a joint business, their intimacy having continued during the whole of the life of the testator, affording him many opportunities for judging of the testator's mind, may give his opinion as to his mental capacity in a will contest, though he had not stated facts in his testimony upon which he based his opinions. Weems v. Weems, 19 Md. 324.

So, a legatee under a will which was contested on the ground of mental incapacity, who had seen the testator for thirty-five years, may testify, excluding any personal transaction or conversation with him, as to how he ate his meals, what she heard him say to others, and what he did, how he acted, and how he appeared, and upon this testimony state her opinion as to his mental condition. Denning v. Butcher, 91 Iowa, 425.

And a stenographer who officiated at the taking of the depositions of a testatrix which consumed two hours shortly before the time of the execution of her will, and who observed her in the meantime, may be asked on a contest of her will to state from his observation of her at that time, and her answer, conduct, and actions, whether or not she was of sound mind. Re Fenton, 97 Iowa, 192.

So, a witness may give her opinion as to the mental capacity of a testatrix at the time her will was made in a proceeding to contest it, where she was present when it was executed and states fully the condition of the testatrix and her appearance and conversations at that time. Brown v. Mitchell, 75 Tex. 9.

And a witness who was with the decedent and assisted in caring for him during the last three days of his life, who details to some extent his appearance and condition at the time, is sufficiently qualified to express an opinion as to whether he was of sound or unsound mind at that time. Mull v. Carr, 5 Ind. App. 491.

And a witness who had interviews with the testator during his last illness, and opportunities for ascertaining his mental condition, may give his opinion as to whether at the time the will was executed the testator had mind and intelligence sufficient to enable him to have a reasonable judgment of the kind and value of the property he proposed to dispose of and to whom he was willing it. Best v. Boat, 87 N. C. 477.

And the opinions of witnesses who were with the testator during his last illness, accompanied with the facts on which they are founded, are competent on the question of his physical power to execute his will or to request another to sign it for him. Blocher v. Hostetter, 2 Grant, Cas. 283.

But evidence of a witness in a will contest that he had lived in the same house with the testatrix, and that he saw her act strangely, does not show a sufficiently long and intimate acquaintance with her to authorize him to give his opinion as to her mental capacity without stating the facts upon which it was based. Murphree v. Senn, 107 Ala. 424.

And a witness in a will contest who had been away for three years, and who had not conversed with the testator for two years before he died, is not competent to give an opinion as to his sanity during the year when he did not see him. Denning v. Butcher, 91 Iowa, 425.

State, 14 Ga. 23; People v. Damon, 18 Wend. 351; Bristow v. Com. 15 Gratt. 648; Dilworth v. Com. 12 Gratt. 689, 65 Am. Dec. 264; Ben- net v. State, 24 Wis. 59; McGuire v. State, 37 Miss. 369, 72 Am. Dec. 124; Sweeney v. Baker, 13 W. Va. 228, 31 Am. Rep. 757; State v. McDonald, 9 W. Va. 465; Parmelo v. Guthery,

2 Root, 185, 1 Am. Dec. 65; State v. Chapman, 1 S. D. 414, 10 L. R. A. 432.

W. F. Culpepper was related to Mr. Bickley, and Mr. Bickley was the agent of the prosecutrix, and of her stepmother, who was also the aunt of the prosecutrix, and employed counsel to prosecute the defendant for them, Nor is a witness who had not conversed with the testator for several years, and who had only observed how he moved about and looked. Denning v. Butcher, 91 Iowa, 425.

And evidence that a witness in a will contest visited the testatrix about twenty years before, and that during such visit she acted like a crazy woman, does not show a sufficiently long and intimate acquaintance with her to authorize the witness to give an opinion as to her mental capacity without stating the facts upon which it is based. Murphree v. Senn, 107 Ala. 424.

So, a witness in an action involving the validity of a deed attacked on the ground of mental incapacity of the grantor, who has testified to his acts and declarations showing an opportunity to form an opinion, may give his opinion as to mental capacity based on such facts. Woodcock v. Johnson, 36 Minn. 217.

And witnesses in an action to cancel a deed, who know the grantor, saw her, and heard her talk, may give their opinions as to her sanity, and it is for the jury to determine whether the reasons of the witnesses for their opinions were satisfactory or not. Frizzell v. Reed, 77 Ga. 724.

And a witness who had been acquainted with a person whose sanity is in question for several years previous to the execution of the bond sued on, a part of which time he had been a law student in witness's office, is not incompetent to state an opinion as to his mental condition. State v. Geddis, 42 Iowa, 288.

And a witness in a contest over a gift made by a person since deceased, who was a relative of and intimate with deceased and had stayed at his house for some time, is competent to testify as to his mental capacity. Stuckey v. Bellah, 41 Ala. 700.

So, the wife of a party to a settlement of a claim who was suffering from a stroke of paralysis is competent to give her opinion as to whether or not he comprehended the facts concerning it in an action involving its validity when she was constantly with him and had the principal care of him, and dressed him, and was the means of communication between him and the world. Burnham v. Mitchell, 34 Wis. 117.

c. A question for the trial court.

The question whether the opinions of nonexpert witnesses as to the sanity of the accused in a criminal prosecution were based upon sufficient observation to entitle them to testify, is addressed to the discretion of the trial judge. Hite v. Com. 14 Ky. L. Rep. 308; First Nat. Bank v. Wirebach, 12 W. N. C. 150; Grand Lodge, I. O. of M. A. v. Welting, 183 Ill. 408.

So, the trial judge is to be accorded wide discretion on the question who is "an intimate acquaintance" who may give an opinion as to the sanity or insanity of another within the meaning of a statute permitting such opinions to be given by intimate acquaintances. People v. McCarthy, 115 Cal. 255; People v. Schmitt, 106 Cal. 48; Re Wax, 106 Cal. 343; Wheelock v. Godfrey, 100 Cal. 578; Carpenter v. Bailey, 94 Cal. 406; People, Clough, v. Levy, 71 Cal. 618; People v. Pico, 62 Cal. 50; People v. Hill, 118 Cal. 562; State v. Hansen, 25 Or. 391.

And the determination as to whether a witness called to testify as to the mental condition of a person had a sufficiently intimate acquaintance with him to render his opinion admissible, will not 38 L. R. A.

be interfered with on appeal where there was no abuse. People, Clough, v. Levy, 71 Cal. 618; People v. McCarthy, 115 Cal. 255; Re Wax, 106 Cal. 343; Wheelock v. Godfrey, 100 Cal. 578; People v. Fine, 77 Cal. 147; People v. Pico, 62 Cal. 50; People v. Hill, 118 Cal. 562; State v. Hansen, 25 Or. 391.

While the appellate court has the right to review the determination, it will not be held erroneous upon a mere difference of opinion; it must clearly appear that the decision below was wrong. People v. Schmitt, 106 Cal. 48.

And if the conclusion reached is one which can be reasonably entertained consistently with the idea that the intimacy must be such that the witness would appreciate the varying moods and temperament of the other, and be able to judge his acts with full knowledge of his peculiarities, the ruling will not be reviewed on appeal. Carpenter v. Bailey, 94 Cal. 406.

And the discretion of the trial court in a criminal case permitting witnesses to give their opinions as to the mental condition of the defendant will not be disturbed on appeal, where it appears that they were acquainted with the defendant, and had more or less opportunity for acquiring knowledge on which to base an opinion. People v. Lane, 101 Cal. 513; People v. McCarthy, 115 Cal. 255.

A refusal to allow a witness in a will contest to give his opinion as to the mental capacity of the testator where the showing of intimacy is sufficient, however, is error, and ground for reversal on appeal. Re Carpenter, 79 Cal. 382.

In Re Carpenter, 79 Cal. 382, People v. Pico, 62 Cal. 53, People, Clough, v. Levy, 71 Cal. 623, and People v. Fine, 77 Cal. 147, supra, were distinguished upon the ground that in all those cases the evidence had been admitted instead of rejected.

So, a statement by a witness that he did not regard himself as intimately acquainted with the person whose sanity is in question does not render him incompetent to give an opinion as to his sanity or insanity, as the question of their intimacy is one for the judge and not for the witnesses. People v. McCarthy, 115 Cal. 255.

VI. Facts and reasons as a basis for an opinion.

a. General rules as to statement of.

Facts and circumstances are the primary evidence on which a jury must rely upon the question of mental capacity, and not the opinions of witnesses as to the soundness or capacity of a party. Browne v. Molliston, 3 Whart. 129; McCullough's Will, 35 Pittsb. L. J. 160; Clarke v. Cartwright, 1 Phillim. Eccl. Rep. 90.

And the opinions of witnesses as to the competency of a testator to make a will are not evidence unless they state the facts on which such opinions are predicated, as it is the facts rather than the opinions that constitute evidence. Hunt v. Hunt, 3 B. Mon. 575.

Neither the opinion of an expert nor of a nonexpert on the question of the mental capacity of a testator is evidence unless the jury find the facts proved upon which the opinions are based, and when such facts are found the opinion is a fact for the jury to consider in connection with the other evidence. Foster v. Dickerson, 64 Vt. 233.

And the court in forming its opinions as to the soundness of mind of a testator will look to the facts upon which the witnesses based their opinions, took great interest in the case, took an active part and interest in the prosecution.

Dumas v. State, 62 Ga. 58; Smith v. Lovejoy, 62 Ga. 874; Georgia R. Co. v. Hart, 60 Ga. 550; Rust v. Shackelford, 47 Ga. 538; Bishop v. State, 9 Ga. 121; Maddox v. State, 32 Ga. 581, 79 Am. Dec. 307; Springer v. State, 34 Ga.

379; Brown v. State, 28 Ga. 439; Almand v. Rockdale County, 78 Ga. 199; Ledford v. State, 75 Ga. 856; Hudgins v. State, 2 Ga. 176; Willis v. State, 12 Ga. 448; Garlits v. State, 71 Md. 293, 4 L. R. A. 601.

The court committed error in allowing the opinion of nonexpert witnesses to go to the rather than to the opinions themselves; but will form its opinion from the whole evidence consisting of facts and opinions. Newton v. Carbery, 5 Cranch, C. C. 626.

The extent to which nonexpert opinions on the question of incompetency may be received depends upon the familiarity of the witness with the person whose sanity is in question, the character of the disqualification, the nature and number of the extraordinary circumstances detailed, and their proximity to the act involved in point of time. O'Connor v. Madison, 98 Mich. 183.

And the opinion of a person not of the medical profession is not evidence of sanity or insanity unless the facts upon which it is based have come under his own observation, and unless he states such facts to the jury. Doe, Sutton, v. Reagan, 5 Blackf. 217, 38 Am. Dec. 466.

And a contestant who attacks a will on the ground of mental incapacity cannot be asked whether the testator was weak minded where the question did not limit the opinion to what he had observed, but embraced what he knew, which might include what he had ascertained from personal transaction and communications. Re Goldthorp, 94 Iowa, 366; Roe v. Taylor, 45 Ill. 485; Schlenker v. State, 9 Neb. 241; Genz v. State, 58 N. J. L. 482; DeWitt v. Barley, 13 Barb. 550; Parkhurst v. Hosford, 21 Fed. Rep. 829.

So, in State v. Maler, 35 W. Va. 757, it was held that a nonexpert witness may give his opinion on the question of the insanity of the accused in a criminal prosecution, where he has personal knowledge of the facts on which his opinion is based.

Before the opinion of a nonexpert witness on the question of sanity or insanity can be considered, it must appear, not only that the witness had the opportunity of learning the facts upon which the opinion is predicated, but that the opinion was in fact based upon the facts and circumstances so ascertained, and not upon bare conjecture. Welch v. Stipe, 95 Ga. 762.

So, the rule has been laid down that a nonexpert witness in a will contest cannot give an opinion as to the sanity or insanity of a testator based on her own observation, and what she had heard the testator say, and not confined to facts to which she had testified. Parsons v. Parsons, 66 Iowa, 754.

Before permitting a nonexpert witness to express his opinion as to the competency of a testator in a will contest the court may properly require the witness to state all of the circumstances upon which his opinion is based, and it would not be a great stretch of discretion to permit cross-examination before allowing the opinion to be given. O'Connor v. Madison, 98 Mich. 183.

A nonexpert witness is competent to give evidence as to the sanity or insanity of a person where he states all the facts upon which he founds his opinion on the trial of an issue of insanity respecting the testimony which has been introduced, but the inquiry should be limited to his conclusion with respect to the facts. Butler v. St. Louis L. Ins. Co., 45 Iowa, 98.

Before the opinions of nonexpert witnesses can be admitted upon the question of sanity or insanity the specific facts upon which they are based must be stated by the witnesses, or their testimony must show that such intimate and close relations have existed between the party alleged to be insane and themselves as fairly to lead to the conclusion 88 L. R. A.

that their opinions are justified by their opportunities for observation. Sbaeffer v. State, 61 Ark. 541.

It is not correct to say that the opinion of a witness is entitled to consideration only so far as the facts stated by him sustain the opinion, however, unless the proposition is understood to include among facts referred to the acquaintance of the witness with the subject-matter, and his opportunities for observation. Shanley's Appeal, 62 Conn. 825.

And the opinion of a nonexpert witness as to the sanity or insanity of another is admissible in evidence, though he is unable to state all the facts upon which he bases his opinion, where he shows acquaintance with such person and opportunity for observation, and that he had observed him. Stumph v. Miller, 142 Ind. 442; Farley v. Parker, 6 Or. 105, 25 Am. Rep. 504.

And nonexpert witnesses may give their opinions in a will contest as to the sanity or insanity of a testator without making a statement of facts upon which the opinions are based, where it is shown that they had an opportunity by association and observation to form such opinion. Newcomb v. Newcomb, 95 Ky. 120; Cotrell v. Com., 13 Ky. L. Rep. 306.

The jury being left to judge as to its value. Cotrell v. Com., 13 Ky. L. Rep. 305.

And the fact that a witness in a will contest, who had an opportunity to form a correct judgment as to the testator's sanity, is unable to state the circumstances upon which his opinion is based, or that the circumstances stated by him do not justify his opinion, does not warrant the court in excluding it as evidence, or in instructing the jury to disregard it. Stubbs v. Houston, 33 Ala. 555.

So, the rule that witnesses in a will contest must state the facts upon which their opinions as to mental capacity are based does not require them to describe what is not susceptible of description or to relate facts enough to enable the jury to form an opinion from them alone; it is sufficient if they state facts which are visible and intelligible appearances and acts. Beaubien v. Cicotte, 12 Mich. 459.

And the rule has been laid down that the opinion of a witness who had an adequate opportunity for observing is admissible when he states some of the facts upon which it is based. Turner v. Kansas City, St. J. & C. B. R. Co., 23 Mo. App. 12; Cruve v. Peters, 68 Mo. 429.

Or where he states such facts as he is able to give, or so far as he is able. Williams v. Lee, 47 Md. 321; Beaubien v. Cicotte, 12 Mich. 469; De Witt v. Barley, 17 N. Y. 840.

Where there are any material facts stated by a witness in a trial for homicide warranting an inference that he has sufficient knowledge to form an opinion as to the sanity of the accused, it is the duty of the court to permit it to go to the jury for whatever it may be worth. Goodwin v. State, 95 Ind. 550.

All that is necessary is that the witness shall describe the conversation, conduct, and manner of the person whose sanity is in question. State v. Murray, 11 Or. 413.

So, there is a difference in the nature of the testimony requisite as a basis for an opinion in the two cases of sanity or insanity; the former is the normal condition and the latter abnormal, and when jury as testimony as to the sanity of the defendant.

Code, § 8867; Penal Code, vol. 3, § 1021; Atlanta Street R. Co. v. Walker, 98 Ga. 465; Berry v. State, 10 Ga. 518; Choice v. State, 81 Ga. 424; Wright v. State, 91 Ga. 80; Patterson v. State, 86 Ga. 70.

It is shown that the witness has sufficient acquaintance to give a reasonable opportunity for judging, testimony that he saw nothing unusual or abnormal is competent. People v. Borgetto, 99 Mich. 386.

And while witnesses who are not experts should, when testifying that a person is insane, accompany their opinions with the facts upon which they are based, this is not necessary where they testify to the sanity of the party, as there may then be no such abnormal facts to be stated. Ford v. State, 71 Ala. 385.

So, a witness in a prosecution for homicide in which insanity is alleged as a defense, whose attention had been called to observe the condition of the prisoner's mind, may be asked whether he saw enough in his intercourse with him to warrant him in expressing an opinion as to his sanity or insanity. Pannell v. Com. 88 Pa. 260.

And a question asked a witness in a criminal prosecution in which insanity is alleged as defense, whether, taking into consideration conversations had with him, and their character and his actions at the time, he was sane or insane, is not subject to objection that it should have included all his observations during the entire period of his acquaintance, where the opposing counsel did not take the trouble to attempt to modify the evidence by cross-examination. People v. Borgetto, 99 Mich. 386.

So, a witness who is competent to give an opinion as to the mental capacity of a person may consider, in forming such opinion, things which he saw and of which he had a personal knowledge, although he did not describe them to the jury. Mull v. Carr, 5 Ind. App. 491.

And in forming an opinion on the subject of the insanity of a testator whose will was made during her last sickness, a nonexpert witness may take into consideration any fact or circumstance within his knowledge or observation which to him appears to afford evidence of her mental condition at the time in question, whether it occurred during her last sickness or at a time prior thereto. Re Norman, 72 Iowa, 84.

b. Effect of failure to state.

A witness who is not an expert cannot testify as to his opinion with reference to the mental capacity of another without stating the facts or reasons upon which his opinion is based. Roberts v. Tra-wick, 13 Ala. 68; Burney v. Torrey, 100 Ala. 157; Grant v. Thompson, 4 Conn. 203, 10 Am. Dec. 119; Jamison v. Jamison, 8 Houst. (Del.) 108; Ethridge v. Bennett, 9 Houst. (Del.) 296; Bowden v. Achor, 95 Ga. 243; Potts v. House, 6 Ga. 324, 50 Am. Dec. 329; Dicken v. Johnson, 7 Ga. 484; Welch v. Stipe, 95 Ga. 762; Doe, Sutton v. Reagan, 5 Blackf. 217, 83 Am. Dec. 466; Sutherland v. Hankins, 56 Ind. 343; Grubb v. State, 117 Ind. 277; Burkhart v. Gladish, 123 Ind. 388; Pennsylvania Co. v. Newmeyer, 129 Ind. 401; Rarick v. Ulmer, 144 Ind. 26; Pelamourges v. Clark, 9 Iowa, 1; State v. Pennyman, 68 Iowa, 216; Parsons v. Parsons, 66 Iowa, 754; Furlong v. Carragher (Iowa) 71 N. W. 210; Shirleys v. Taylor, 5 B. Mon. 99; Eloi v. Eloi, 36 La. Ann. 553; Dorsey v. Warfield, 7 Md. 65; Waters v. Waters, 95 Md. 531; Lynch v. Doran, 95 Mich. 295; O'Connor v. Madison, 98 Mich. 183; Re Pluney, 27 Minn. 280; State v. Klunger, 46 Mo. 224; Turner v. Kansas City, St. J. & C. B. R. Co. 23 Mo. App. 12; Re Vanauken, 10 N. J. Eq. 190; State v. Abrams, 11 Or. 169; Dickinson v. Dickinson, 61 Pa. 401; First Nat. Bank v. Wirebach, 106 Pa. 37; Doran 88 L. R. A.

If the defendant committed the homicide, and at the time of the commission he was afflicted with a mental disease, and by reason of said mental disease had lost the power of will to control his actions and choose between right and wrong, he would not be guilty.

Roberts v. State, 3 Ga. 310; Parsons v. State, v. McConlogue, 150 Pa. 98; Stokes v. Miller, 10 W. N. C. 241; First Nat. Bank v. Wirebach, 12 W. N. C. 150; Adams v. State, 34 Tex. Crim. Rep. 470; Yanke v. State, 51 Wis. 464.

Opinions must be founded on facts which must be given to the jury that they may determine the weight to be given to the opinions. Elicessor v. Elicessor, 146 Pa. 359; Titlow v. Titlow, 54 Pa. 216, 98 Am. Dec. 691; Burney v. Torrey, 100 Ala. 157; Shaver v. McCarthy, 110 Pa. 339; Shaeffer v. State, 61 Ark. 241; Goodwin v. State, 96 Ind. 550; Colee v. State, 75 Ind. 513; State v. Mewberter, 46 Iowa, 68; Godden v. Burke, 35 La. Ann. 160; Beaubien v. Ciotte, 12 Mich. 469; Hoover v. State, 48 Neb. 184; De Witt v. Barly, 17 N. Y. 340; Williams v. State, 37 Tex. Crim. Rep. —, 39 S. W. 687.

And the opinion of witnesses as to the sanity or insanity of a person will not be received where grounds for such opinion are not stated. Rambler v. Tryon, 7 Serg. & R. 90, 10 Am. Dec. 444; Rice v. Rice, 50 Mich. 448, 53 Mich. 432.

Or where no reason is assigned for considering him of unsound mind. Shirleys v. Taylor, 5 B. Mon. 299.

And an opinion of a witness that a testator was insane at the time of making his will is not competent where he admits that he knew no facts or circumstances on which to found such opinion. Bowling v. Bowling, 8 Ala. 538.

And the exclusion of the opinions of physicians in a prosecution for homicide, who were not experts in insanity, and who had not had sufficient opportunity for examination to express an opinion upon the question of insanity, is not error. State v. Crisp, 126 Mo. 605.

Nonexpert witnesses as to the soundness of mind of a person should be preceded by testimony as to the facts, acts, declarations, etc., of the subject of inquiry. Sheehan v. Kearney (Miss.) 35 L. R. A. 102, and see supra, I., a.

Before the opinions of nonexpert witnesses can be received on the question of sanity or insanity of another, they should disclose, not only their opportunity for observation, but should also state the facts which they observed which are the basis of their opinions. Moore v. Sanford, 2 Kan. App. 242.

Witnesses who are not experts may be permitted to state their opinions as to the sanity or insanity of a person, but it can only be done in connection with their statements of the particular conduct and expressions which form the basis of their judgment. State v. Williamson, 100 Mo. 162.

And the opinion of a nonexpert witness is not admissible in evidence to prove the mental condition of another, although formed from personal observation of the appearance and conduct of the individual, where it is not accompanied by a statement of the facts within his own knowledge upon which he bases it. Yanke v. State, 51 Wis. 464.

And the mother of a testatrix cannot testify as to her opinion as to the soundness of mind of the testatrix where she neither states the facts coming under her observation nor that the opinion expressed is the result of such observation, though it is shown by the testimony of the other witnesses that the testatrix had lived with her mother all her life. Welch v. Stipe, 95 Ga. 762.

So, the grantee in a trust deed, and the party whose debt is secured thereby, are not competent to give their opinions as to the grantor's sanity in an action to set aside the deed based on neither 81 Ala. 577, 60 Am. Rep. 193; Danforth v. State, 75 Ga. 614, 58 Am. Rep. 490; Choice v. State, 81 Ga. 424; Carr v. State, 96 Ga. 284.

Mr. J. M. Terrell, Attorney General, for the State:

The motions to continue were addressed to the discretion of the court.

As there was no abuse of discretion, there exists no error.

Thompson v. State, 24 Ga. 297; Maddox v. State, 32 Ga. 582, 79 Am. Dec. 307; Johnson v. State, 48 Ga. 116; Brinkley v. State, 54 Ga. 371; Lovett v. State, 60 Ga. 257; Cox v. State, 64 Ga. 403, 37 Am. Rep. 76.

transactions or conversations had with him previously or at any time. Anderson v. Cranmer, 11 W. Va. 532.

And a witness on a prosecution for crime cannot give his opinion as to whether the accused could discriminate between right and wrong or had sufficient mental power to control his actions, where no evidence had been given tending to show that he could not so discriminate, or that from mental disorder as distinguished from overmastering anger or revenge he could not control his actions. Smith v. State, 59 Ark. 139.

But the opinion of nonexpert witnesses in a criminal prosecution that the accused was not insane after a conflict with a designated person is not rendered incompetent by the fact that they had not, before expressing their opinions, detailed the facts and circumstances upon which they were formed, where they testified that they had been well acquainted with him before the conflict, and had observed his manner and conduct, and had seen him frequently after that and observed his manner, conduct, and conversations, and had observed nothing different in his conduct, the theory sought to be established being that he became insane after the conflict. State v. Winter, 72 Iowa, 627.

So, an affidavit on an application for a continuance in a criminal case stating that the witnesses named will testify that the defendant was of unsound mind, is insufficient where they are not expert witnesses and it does not state the specific facts indicating insanity upon which their opinions are based. Warner v. State, 114 Ind. 137.

And a continuance will not be granted for the purpose of procuring the testimony of a witness in a criminal prosecution in which insanity is alleged, to the effect that the accused was of weak mind and subject to fits of such mental derangement and aberration of mind as to incapacitate him from distinguishing right from wrong, where no fact or act of the accused is given upon which his opinion is to be based. Mendiola v. State, 18 Tex. App. 463.

Nor will a new trial be granted on the ground of the erroneous exclusion of the opinion of a witness as to the mental condition of a person alleged to be of unsound mind, unless it alleges that such witness had testified to facts showing him to be qualified to give such opinion. Sutherland v. Hankins, 58 Ind. 343.

But where witnesses had previously given testimony of circumstances showing an opportunity to judge as to the soundness or unsoundness of a person whose sanity is in question, they may properly testify as to their opinion on the question without repeating the circumstances in connection with the opinion. People v. Borgetto, 99 Mich. 336; Van Hues v. Rainbolt, 2 Coldw. 139.

And an objection to the admission of the opinion of witnesses as to the sanity of the accused in a criminal prosecution on the ground that the reasons upon which they were based were not given, cannot be first taken on appeal where it was not made on the trial and witnesses were not required to give their reasons and their refusal made a special ground of objection. State v. Murray, 11 Or. 418.

Some of the cases, however, have not gone so far as to hold opinions entirely inadmissible when facts are not given to support them, the absence of such facts being regarded as affecting the weight rather than the admissibility.

Thus, under the general pleading witnesses must set forth particular facts and expressions to show insanity, otherwise their evidence would be of no weight. Sheafe v. Rowe, 2 Lee, Ecol. Rep. 415.

So, mere expressions of opinion by nonexpert witnesses as to whether or not a designated person was incompetent for the transaction of business, not founded upon any facts stated by the witness from which the court may judge of the soundness of the opinions, if evidence at all, are of the slightest possible value. Doughty v. Doughty, 7 N. J. Eq. 643.

c. What facts may be stated.

A witness in giving the facts upon which he bases his opinion on the question of sanity or insanity should be permitted to state every fact which could be reasonably made the foundation of an opinion as to the mental condition of the person in question. Burkhart v. Gladish, 123 Ind. 338.

One who is competent to give an opinion as to the mental capacity of the testator in a will contest may state all she knows about him both before and after it is claimed that his mind failed, together with what he did and said, and the change, if any, in his manner. Staser v. Hogan, 120 Ind. 227.

And a legatee under a will is a competent witness in an action to set aside the will as to the mental condition of the testator, and not being an expert she may be required to state the facts upon which such opinion was based, including the conduct of the testator, what he said, the manner in which he conducted himself, his appearance, and his full history up to the time of his death. Staser v. Hogan, 120 Ind. 227.

And a petition to the probate court for an allowance to a testatrix as widow from her husband's estate is admissible in evidence in a proceeding to contest her will as a part of the res gestae forming the basis of the opinion of her attorney as to her insanity, where he detailed the conversations and business transactions which he had with her at the time and the making of the petition was one of the transactions forming the basis of his opinion. Foster v. Dickerson, 64 Vt. 233.

And a master in chancery before whom a testatrix had appeared as a witness may testify as to the circumstances under which she gave her testimony, her appearance and deportment at the time, and state what questions were asked and the answers which she gave, for the purpose of establishing a basis for his opinion as to her mental condition at the time. Foster v. Dickerson, 64 Vt. 233.

So, nonexpert witnesses may testify in a will contest to the behavior of the testator, his conduct and conversation and appearance, and to particular facts tending to throw light on the state of his mind and from which its condition may be fairly inferred, and give their own individual opinions as to what they thought of his capacity. Ethridge v. Bennett, 9 Houst. (Del.) 235.

And a witness should be permitted to state in what manner the testator's conversation was disconnected as tending to show his qualifications as a nonexpert and as bearing upon the question of mental capacity. Re Goldthorp, 94 Iowa, 333.

So, the acts and conduct of a person accused of crime while in jail under arrest therefor may be given as a basis for the opinion of the witness upon

Juror Culpepper was not disqualified. He was not shown to be related, either by consanguinity or affinity, to the deceased or to the prosecutrix. The fact that he was related to Bickley, the agent of the prosecutrix, would not disqualify him.

Bickley himself might not have been a competent juror, but as he had no contingent fee in the case and was under no liability contingent on the result thereof, no good reason exists why his cousin, juror Culpepper, should not be adjudged a competent juror.

the prosecution as to his sanity, though the accused was not warned that his acts and expressions would be used against him. Adams v. State, 34 Tex. Crim. Rep. 470.

And where evidence of a conversation is given for the mere purpose of laying a foundation for the admission of the witness's opinion as to the sanity of a person accused of crime the entire conversation must be given in evidence, so far, at least, as it formed a part of the ground upon which the witness's opinion was based. Jamison v. People, 145 Ill. 357.

But a nonexpert witness in a criminal case who has testified that on the day before the criminal act was committed the defendant had come to her house and talked at random and looked so much like a maniac that she was afraid of him, cannot be required to state the conversation she had with him at that time, when such conversation constitutes no part of the transaction for which the defendant is on trial. Taylor v. United States, 7 App. D. C. 27.

And the statute permitting the opinion of an intimate acquaintance to be given in a criminal prosecution respecting the mental sanity of the accused does not authorize him as a matter of right to call out statements made by himself to witnesses in various conversations had with them. State v. Murray, 11 Or. 413.

So, a witness in a will contest cannot narrate communications from the testator to her and base her opinion on them as to his sanity. Turner v. Cook, 35 Ind. 129.

And a witness testifying as to the mental capacity of a testator cannot be permitted to detail conversations between himself and a third person with relation to the testator and his eccentricities. Hughes v. Hughes, 31 Ala. 519; Hutchinson v. Hutchinson, 50 Ill. App. 87.

And a justice of the peace before whom a testator who was a lawyer conducted a trial cannot be permitted to testify that he managed the case well and shrewdly where he did not detail all that he said or did in the management of the cause. Staser v. Hogan, 120 Ind. 207.

And evidence as to the contents of a letter upon which a nonexpert witness based his opinion as to the sanity of the accused is not admissible in a criminal prosecution unless the loss or destruction of such letter had been previously shown. Adams v. State, 34 Tex. Crim. Rep. 470.

So, to authorize expressions of an opinion by a nonexpert witness on the question of the mental condition of another he must state facts which have some significance upon the question of such mental condition. State v. Leehman, 2 S. D. 171; Burney v. Torrey, 100 Ala. 157; Sutherland v. Hanks, 56 Ind. 343; Waters v. Waters, 35 Md. 531; People v. Borgetto, 99 Mich. 238; O'Connor v. Madison, 78 Mich. 183; Lynch v. Doran, 95 Mich. 386; Elicessor v. Elicessor, 146 Pa. 359; First Nat. Bank v. Wirebach, 106 Pa. 37, 12 W. N. C. 150; Stokes v. Miller, 10 W. N. C. 241; State v. Brooks, 4 Wash. 323.

The rule is that such opinions may be given in connection with the facts upon which they are formed where such facts are of such a nature as to enable him to form a knowledge of the person's intellect. Stewart v. Redditt, 3 Md. 67; Jamison v. Jamison, 8 Houst. (Del.) 108; Potts v. House, 6 Ga. 224, 50 Am. Dec. 329; Pittard v. Foster, 12 Ill. App. 34 L. R. A.

132; Gibson v. Gibson, 9 Yerg. 329; Foster v. Dickerson, 64 Vt. 238.

And it must appear that he had some knowledge of the acts and conduct of the person. Colee v. State, 75 Ind. 513.

Where the facts testified to by a nonexpert witness as a ground for his opinion on the issue of sanity or insanity are few or trivial or such as are common alike to sane and insane people, it is improper to ask for the opinion of a witness. Ex parte Schneider, 21 D. C. 438.

And a nonexpert witness cannot give an opinion as to the sanity or insanity of another where she had not testified to any acts of such person which would indicate that he was other than sane. State v. Williamson, 106 Mo. 162.

The facts upon which an opinion of a nonexpert witness as to testamentary capacity of another are founded must afford a fair foundation for an opinion on the particular point in dispute. Elicessor v. Elicessor, 146 Pa. 359.

And the evidence required to show sufficient opportunity upon the part of a witness to judge as to the mental capacity of a person alleged to be insane should be such as might properly move judicial discretion by apprising the court that the witness may believe in the competency of the person upon reasonable grounds, in order to justify his opinion that the person in question was sane, the testimony being more or less valuable as the circumstances are more or less convincing. People v. Borgetto, 99 Mich. 336; O'Connor v. Madison, 99 Mich. 183.

The opinions of nonexpert witnesses as to sanity or insanity of a testator are not admissible where the facts stated by them on which they base their opinions relate to the disease and sufferings of the testator and his inability to do business, but have no relation to his mental condition or testamentary capacity. Karick v. Ulmer, 144 Ind. 25.

And a continuance will not be granted in a criminal prosecution for the purpose of procuring the testimony of a witness who was expected to testify that she believed the defendant to be insane, based upon the facts shown by the evidence, and that he was a somnambulist, where it is not probable that the jury would have believed her conclusion and opinion to be correct in the face of other testimony to the effect that somnambulism is not a symptom or evidence of insanity. Fisher v. State, 30 Tex. App. 502.

So, an opinion is inadmissible when it is based on previous knowledge and is not derived from the immediate facts to which the witness has testified. State v. Stickley, 41 Iowa, 232.

But a witness in an action in which a party's sanity is in question, who has stated facts which lead him to believe that such party was foolish and simple, may give his opinion as to his capacity to transact business or enter into contract. Stewart v. Spedden, 5 Md. 433.

And associates and neighbors of a person accused of crime who alleged insanity and detailed instances and circumstances conducing, though slightly, to show that condition, may give their opinions as to his sanity at the time of the act, upon the facts shown and their knowledge of the man. Massie v. Com. 15 Ky. L. Rep. 562.

And the opinions of nonexpert witnesses on the question of testamentary capacity are not rendered inadmissible by the fact that the opinions are not shown to be based on any correct understanding of the true criterion of mental capacity to make a will, where no objection was made to the introduction of opinions in evidence, and the witnesses were not required as they might have been to state the grounds of their belief. Appleby v. Brook, 76 Mo. 314.

So, the opinions of witnesses as to the mental capacity of a party should not be rejected in a proceeding before a master because based on facts which in the opinion of the master did not indicate any mental incapacity, though if based on conversations only they might with propriety be rejected. Chickering v. Brooks, 61 Vt. 554.

The particular facts stated by each of the several witnesses as to the testamentary capacity of another must be taken alone as the basis of the proposed opinion of that witness, however, and if they are found by themselves inconclusive in their nature, or of such neutral character as to be consistent either with soundness or unsoundness of mind, they cannot be assumed as the basis of an opinion. Elcessor v. Elcessor, 146 Pa. 369.

But the testimony of witnesses in an action upon a promissory note in which the insanity of the maker is alleged will not be stricken out as wholly irrelevant and immaterial to the issue of insanity merely because the facts testified to by each taken separately may not prove or tend to prove sanity or insanity to a sufficient extent to qualify the witness to express his individual opinion on the question. First Nat. Bank v. Wirebach, 106 Pa. 37.

d. What facts warrant an opinion.

What statement of facts would show a sufficient foundation to warrant the giving of an opinion by a nonexpert witness as to the sanity of a testator depends upon the circumstances of each case, and must be left for the trial court to determine in the exercise of a wise, legal discretion, and its ruling will not be disturbed unless it clearly appears that it has not properly exercised its discretion. Denning v. Butcher, 91 Iowa, 425; Shaeffer v. State, 61 Ark. 241; First Nat. Bank v. Wirebach, 12 W. N. C. 150; Boorman v. Northwestern Mut. Relief Assn., 90 Wis. 144.

It is a question for the court to decide before the opinion can be admitted, but after its admission the weight to be given it is to be determined by the jury. Shaeffer v. State, 61 Ark. 241; Denning v. Butcher, 91 Iowa, 425.

And it is the right of the opposing party to cross-examine the witness before the court passes upon the question. First Nat. Bank v. Wirebach, 12 W. N. C. 150.

What is required to establish a sufficient opportunity for judging as to the soundness of another depends upon circumstances which may properly affect the judicial discretion, the testimony being more or less valuable as the circumstances are more or less convincing. People v. Borgetto, 90 Mich. 336.

The opinion of nonexpert witnesses as to the sanity of a testator are not evidence in a will contest, but where the witness has stated the appearance, conduct, and conversations of the testator, or other facts from which he draws his conclusions, he may then state his theory based upon such facts. Puryear v. Reese, 6 Coldw. 21.

1, 2, 3. When the case of the accused was called for trial, he made a motion for a continuance on account of the absence of four witnesses. His motion complied strictly with the law regulating such matters. Penal Code, § 962. And the only matters about which there could be any question were whether

And nonexperts who have had opportunities to observe a person may give their opinions of his mental condition or capacity, at the same time stating their reason and the facts observed upon which they based their opinions, including conversations as a part of the facts observed. Jamison v. People, 145 Ill. 357; Hutchinson v. Hutchinson, 50 Ill. App. 87.

And a witness who details a conversation had between himself and another may also, in connection therewith, state his opinion or impression as to the state of the mind of such person as it appeared to him at that time. People v. Sandford, 43 Cal. 22.

Thus, testimony of a witness in an action to set aside a deed, that he knew the grantor, and that he was in the habit of drinking to excess, and that he appeared to be afraid that his own negroes would kill him, is sufficient to qualify him to give an opinion as to the grantor's insanity. Dicken v. Johnson, 7 Ga. 484.

And that witnesses in a criminal prosecution knew the defendant and had known him for a considerable length of time, and that he always acted like a sane man, is sufficient to warrant them in forming and giving an opinion as to his sanity. Taylor v. State, 28 Ga. 647.

And a witness in a will contest who had been a neighbor of the testator, and had known him well for twenty-five years, and had often had dealings with him, and would never during his acquaintance have hesitated to buy from him or sell to him to any amount, may be permitted to give his opinion based on such facts and his acquaintance with him, that he was of sound and disposing mind, and capable of executing a valid deed or contract. Townshend v. Townshend, 7 Gill, 110.

So, a nonexpert witness upon the question of the soundness of mind of another may describe the conduct and repeat the declarations of the persons whose mental capacity is in question, but the declarations are not themselves evidence against the adverse party except in so far as they constitute a part of the facts upon which the opinion of the witness is founded. Johnson v. Culver, 116 Ind. 278.

That a witness had known a person accused of the murder of his wife for six or seven years, and enjoyed the most friendly relations with him, and saw him two or three times a week after his separation from his wife extending over a period of several months, and at different times conversed with him about his separation, do not, however, authorize him to give an opinion as to his sanity. State v. Brooks, 4 Wash. 333.

And a nonexpert witness in a criminal prosecution cannot give his opinion whether the accused was of sound mind from her conversations and looks and from his knowledge of and acquaintance with her, where he had described her appearance and manner but had paid little attention to and does not undertake to detail what she said. State v. Stickley, 41 Iowa, 232.

And a nonexpert witness who testifies in a prosecution for burglary that he has known the accused for many years, and that he does not think that he can distinguish between right and wrong so as to know that it is wrong to commit burglary, does not show himself competent to give an opinion as to whether the accused would have sufficient mental power to keep from committing the crime if he

the facts sought to be proved by the absent witnesses were material to the defense, and whether or not he could prove the same facts as well by other witnesses. It was claimed that the accused was subject to fits of insanity, produced by a chronic disease of the ear, which originated at an early period of his life; and that, when suffering from the effects of this disease, he was, and had been at various times in his life, insane and irresponsible. Two of the absent witnesses were his brothers, who, according to the showing made, had associated with him more intimately than his other relatives, and his could distinguish between right and wrong Sbaeffer v. State, 61 Ark. 241.

And the opinion of a witness on a prosecution for murder in which insanity is alleged, who had stated that the accused had received injuries upon the head in his youth, and that his language and conduct were at times strange and extraordinary, as to whether his language and conduct were those of a rational man, is not admissible without detailing the facts in regard to such language and conduct which he thought strange and extraordinary. State v. Coleman, 27 La. Ann. 691.

So, witnesses in a will contest who simply testify to erratic behavior on the part of the testatrix, and that she was changeable and sometimes got angry, are not competent to give opinions as to her mental capacity. Prentiss v. Bates, 88 Mich. 567.

And that a testator was old and had failed in health, and was feeble, and that his mind was not so strong as formerly, and that he was deaf, do not raise a presumption of incompetency which will support the opinion of a nonexpert witness. O'Connor v. Madison, 98 Mich. 183.

And that the testator differed from the witnesses in political opinion; and that he had no knowledge of the good qualities of a horse, does not furnish a sufficient basis to warrant the witness in giving an opinion as to his sanity or insanity. Dorsey v. Wardfield, 7 Md. 65.

So, conversations held with a testatrix some time after the execution of her will do not qualify a witness to give an opinion as to her capacity to make it. Eckert v. Flowry, 43 Pa. 46.

And a witness in a will contest who testifies that she had known the testatrix for six years before she made her will, and was quite intimate with her during that time, and had frequent conversations with her about her children, her life, hardships which she had gone through, and other little family matters, states no facts or circumstances which justify the court in permitting her to give an opinion as to the mental capacity of the testatrix. Buys v. Buys, 99 Mich. 354.

So, evidence that an aged grantor lost his way in the city near his home, and that he sometimes addressed one of his daughters by the name of another, and that he sometimes seemed low spirited and cried and sat all day without talking unless someone spoke to him, is not sufficient proof of loss of memory or mental incapacity to justify the giving of an opinion based upon such facts. Lynch v. Doran, 95 Mich. 395.

And evidence that a witness knew a party whose sanity was in question when he was a small boy and lived near her, and had seen her at church, and that she did not eat with the family where she lived or speak to him or his family, and was in some respects peculiar in her habits, is not sufficient to form a foundation to authorize him to give an opinion as to such party's sanity. Stewart v. Redditt, 3 Md. 67.

And evidence that a witness had met a person whose sanity was in question frequently, that he was a man of active habits but had paralysis, and that after that there was a change in him,—his walk and activity and speech were affected and the expression of his countenance changed, and that it required an effort to speak, and that his face did not look intelligent, and that he looked like a man who was afflicted and distressed,—does not tend to prove insanity or delirium, and does not warrant the witness in expressing an opinion that the person was insane. First Nat. Bank v. Wirebach, 13 W. N. C. 150.

And a refusal to receive such an opinion as to the sanity of another is not error where the only foundation laid was that the witness worked with the party in question a few days cutting ice, and that he became quarrelsome and got mad at him because he claimed he did not drive the horse straight while the other was holding the plow. Boorman v. Northwestern Mut. Relief Assn. 90 Wis. 144.

In First Nat. Bank v. Wirebach, 13 W. N. C. 150, the rule in Irish v. Smith, 8 Serg. & R. 578, 11 Am. Dec. 643, infra, VII. d. 1, and Wilkinson v. Pearson, 23 Pa. 117, supra, III. which to some extent supports the doctrine that a witness may express an opinion on the question of sanity or insanity based upon the countenance alone, was said to be of doubtful application in a case in which the countenance was distorted by paralysis, and would not apply where it was not clear that the witnesses based their opinions upon the mere appearance of the face.

VII. Scope.

a. Confinement to conclusions from facts stated.

To render the opinions of nonexpert witnesses admissible on a question of sanity they must be limited to conclusions drawn from specific acts and facts testified to by them. Jamison v. People, 145 Ill. 367; Re Rosa, 87 N. Y. 514.

The opinions should be based only upon the facts testified to by the particular witnesses. Ex parte Schnelder, 21 D. C. 433. And see also Elcessor v. Elcessor, 146 Pa. 359, and First Nat. Bank v. Wirebach, 106 Pa. 37, supra, VI. c.

And must be founded upon their own observation. Appley v. Brook, 76 Mo. 314; Morse v. Crawford, 17 Vt. 502, 44 Am. Dec. 349.

And they must be confined to statements of facts or of their opinions formed from facts known to the witness and disclosed to the jury. Re Blood, 62 Vt. 359.

And a nonexpert witness on a question involving the validity of a deed is not competent to testify whether in his opinion the grantor would be easily persuaded to do any act dictated by any person he considered a friend, where any fear or difficulty might threaten him or his property, unless he became so in view of the acts and conduct of of such party which he had witnessed and to which he had testified. Brand v. Brand, 39 How. Pr. 193.

So, nonexpert witnesses in a criminal prosecution cannot give their opinions as to the sanity of the accused based on evidence which they have heard other witnesses detail. State v. Klinger, 46 Mo. 224; State v. Brinyea, 5 Ala. 241; Appley v. Brook, 76 Mo. 314.

Expert witnesses alone can give an opinion upon facts shown by others assuming them to be true. State v. Potts, 100 N. C. 457.

And nonexpert witnesses cannot give opinions upon the question whether a hypothetical state of facts would or would not if true be evidence of insanity. State v. Klinger, 46 Mo. 224; Appley v. Brook, 76 Mo. 314; Dunham's Appeal, 27 Conn. 192; Pittard v. Foster, 12 Ill. App. 182.

Even upon cross-examination. Dunham's Appeal, 27 Conn. 192.

And a nonexpert witness cannot be asked to state physical and mental condition was more peculiarly within their knowledge than that of any other members of his family. Another witness was one who had been acquainted with him from his childhood and who knew of his infirmity, and of his periods of alleged insanity and irresponsibility. The remaining to the jury if the symptoms and indications testified to by other witnesses were proved and they were satisfied of their truth whether in his opinion having heard all the symptoms and indications a designated person was of sound or unsound mind, and if of unsound mind what are the nature and character of such unsoundness, where conflicting symptoms and indications had been testified to, as it would serve virtually to put the witness in the jury box and require him to weigh the evidence. Smith v. Hickenbottom, 57 Iowa, 783.

So, a nonexpert witness cannot give his opinion as to the sanity or insanity of another witness. Territory v. Padilla, 8 N. M. 610.

And a witness by whom the weakness of intellect and failure of memory of another witness were sought to be shown, who is not an expert, is not competent to give his opinion as to the value of her testimony. Howard v. Russell, 75 Tex. 171.

And a witness in a will contest cannot give his opinion of the physical capacity of a testator to hold conversations testified to by another witness where he was not present at that time. Higgins v. Carlton, 28 Md. 115, 32 Am. Dec. 606.

So an opinion of a nonexpert witness as to mental capacity cannot be given where it is founded upon mere hearsay. Appleby v. Brook, 76 Mo. 314.

And letters sent to a testator are not admissible in evidence to show the opinions of the writers as to his capacity, such evidence offered being in the nature of hearsay. Tatham v. Wright, 2 Russ. & M. 1.

And a witness in a criminal prosecution cannot be asked whether the accused was considered partially deranged, as such a question does not call for his own opinion. Yankee v. State, 51 Wis. 464.

Nor can a witness in a will contest be asked if he ever heard anybody question the sanity of the testator, as the opinions of others not under oath as to sanity or insanity are not admissible. Staser v. Hogan, 120 Ind. 207.

And evidence in a trial for murder as to what certain persons who took the accused to the hospital for medical treatment previous to the offense thought as to his mental condition at that time is not competent, being merely hearsay. State v. Gut, 18 Minn. 343.

Nor is it competent to prove the effect of the conduct of a person accused of homicide upon the mind of another person on the day before the commission of the act on the question of sanity on a prosecution therefor. Lake v. People, 1 Park. Crim. Rep. 495.

b. Comparisons and conclusions from observation.

Neighbors of a testator who were well acquainted with him and competent to give opinions as to his sanity may testify on a contest of his will as to his appearance and why they thought he did not recognize them, and whether his mind was simply weakened or was impaired in some of its faculties, and whether he was worse or better, and whether he could or could not hold extended conversations. Meeker v. Meeker, 74 Iowa, 362.

And a nonexpert witness in a will contest, who was well acquainted with the testator both in sickness and in health and had the care of him in sickness, may be permitted to testify that he saw no difference between his mental condition in sickness and his mental condition in health. Severin v. Zack, 55 Iowa, 23.

witness was a physician who had known the accused all his life, and was professionally familiar with the nature of the alleged disease. It further appeared in the showing for a continuance that all of these witnesses would swear to the insanity of the accused at times when his disease was at its worst. In the

So, questions by the contestant of a will as to whether the witness noticed during a designated time any weakening of the testator's mind, and whether during a specified time his mind had weakened, is not objectionable as leading. Fraser v. Jennison, 42 Mich. 206.

And evidence of a competent witness in a will contest that he saw no difference between the testator's mental condition in sickness and in health is not rendered inadmissible by Iowa Code, § 354, though he is a party to the suit. Severin v. Zack, 55 Iowa, 23.

And a witness on the contested probate of a will may compare the mind and memory of the testatrix, as regarding the amount of property she was worth and the disposition she wished to make of it, with that of an average child of a designated number of years of age. Richmond's Appeal, 39 Conn. 226.

But a witness in a will contest cannot be asked to contrast the testator's mental condition at a time not fixed or limited with his mental condition as it had been in prior years. Denning v. Butcher, 91 Iowa, 425.

In Denning v. Butcher, 91 Iowa, 425, supra, Re Norman, 72 Iowa, 84, supra, 1. a. and Severin v. Zack, 55 Iowa, 23, supra, were distinguished upon the ground that in neither of them was the question of the right of the court to pass upon the sufficiency of the foundation laid for the admission of the opinions of the witnesses raised or determined.

So, insanity cannot be shown in a criminal prosecution by evidence of a nonexpert witness comparing the accused with other insane persons whom the witness claims to know, stating that such persons are well known to be insane. Gehrke v. State, 13 Tex. 568.

But a nonexpert witness who was acquainted with a testator and had given facts from which a conclusion might be drawn as to the state of his mind, such as his manner, conversations, etc., at or near the time of the execution of the will, may be asked what impression the facts stated made upon him as to the soundness of the testator's mind. Kenworthy v. Williams, 5 Ind. 376.

And a witness in a will contest in which insanity is alleged may be asked if the deceased said or did anything showing a want of soundness of the mind, and if so what it was. Watson v. Anderson, 11 Ala. 43.

And a witness in a will contest who had had a business transaction with the testator which he detailed to the jury may testify whether anything occurred at the time which indicated a want of understanding on the part of the testator as to the business in which he was engaged, and whether he saw anything that indicated mental derangement, and as to his opinion as to the decedent's mental condition. Rice v. Rice, 53 Mich. 432.

And witnesses examined by the state in a criminal prosecution in rebuttal on the question of insanity, who have had transactions with the prisoner and known him well for a long time immediately preceding the commission of the criminal act, may be asked whether or not they had ever observed anything about the accused, or in what he said or did, that indicated insanity. State v. Maier, 36 W. Va. 707.

So, nonexpert witnesses in a will contest who had without objection testified to their acquaintance showing the facts upon which their testimony would be based appeared in detail. The counter showing disclosed that there were other relatives, members of the immediate family of the accused, who were present at the trial, and could be called as witnesses; but it did not appear that any of these would testify to the peculiar facts set out in the motion for a continuance, and upon which it was based. It is proper, however, to add that the four absent witnesses did not see the accused on the day of the homicide, or at any time immediately preceding that day. In a case like the present, where there has been a shocking with the testator embracing details and particulars, and given their opinions founded upon such recited facts, as to the soundness of the testator's mind, may be asked whether they ever observed in his appearance or manner or conduct anything which indicated mental unsoundness, the questions calling for a simple affirmative or negative reply, with full opportunity for cross-examination to elicit how much in the answer was matter of fact and how much opinion as to what would indicate mental unsoundness. Kimberly's Appeal, 68 Conn. 428; 87 L. R. A. 261.

c. Conclusions of law and fact.

The inquiry as to the opinion of a nonexpert witness as to the sanity or insanity of another should be limited to his conclusion with respect to the facts. Butler v. St. Louis L. Ins. Co. 45 Iowa, 93.

And opinions embracing all the merits leaving nothing for the jury to decide cannot be given. Struckey v. Bellah, 41 Ala. 700; Pelamoures v. Clark, 9 Iowa, 1.

Thus, a statement by a nonexpert witness, in answer to a question as to how the person, whose mental condition was in question acted, that his acts were insanity, is neither a statement of facts as to such person's conduct nor the expression of an opinion that he was authorized to make, and its exclusion is not error. State v. Leehman, 2 S. D. 171.

And a nonexpert witness cannot give an opinion in an action to set aside a deed for undue influence and fraud that the grantor could not be influenced by any power on earth whether the effort to divert him from a fixed purpose was made by friend or foe, as such opinion would determine the very question of fact upon which the controversy depends. Smith v. Smith, 117 N. C. 326.

It has been held, however, that the right to express an opinion as to the sanity or insanity of another includes the right to give it as to the degree or extent of the mental infirmity, and to apply it to the particular matter in controversy. Scalf v. Collin County, 30 Tex. 514.

And that where an issue as to the sanity or insanity of a person is one upon which a witness may properly state his opinion he may do so notwithstanding the fact that his answer embraces the very issue on trial. Scalf v. Collin County, 30 Tex. 514.

And questions asked witnesses in a will contest, competent to give opinions as to the testator's sanity, as to his appearance and whether they thought he did not know them, and as to whether his mind was simply weakened or was impaired in some of its faculties, and whether he got worse or better, and whether he could or could not hold an extended conversation, are not objectionable as calling for opinions upon questions of which the jury was equally qualified to judge if possessed of the same facts as the witnesses. Meeker v. Meeker, 74 Iowa, 362.

And a question asked a nonexpert witness in a will contest as to his opinion based upon his knowledge and observation of the condition of her mind, whether when he last saw the testatrix before the date of the alleged will she was competent or of sufficient capacity to transact business or make a will, is not objectionable as embodying a rule for measuring and testing the legal capacity of the deceased to make a valid disposition of her estate 88 L. R. A.

by will, but is a valid method of ascertaining the degree and extent of the mental capabilities of the person and the vigor and strength of her will. Horah v. Knox, 87 N. C. 453.

On this subject, see also note, Right of witness to give an opinion on the exact issue to be tried in respect to sanity or mental capacity, to Brown v. Mitchell (Tex.) 86 L. R. A. 64.

d. As to particular statements

1. In criminal proceedings.

A nonprofessional witness, who has detailed what he has seen and observed in the conduct of a person accused of crime, may give his opinion as to whether the accused had sufficient mind to discriminate between right and wrong in reference to his act. Smith v. State, 59 Ark. 139; Pfueger v. State, 46 Neb. 493; United States v. Guiteau, 1 Mackey, 493, 47 Am. Rep. 247.

In Pfueger v. State, 46 Neb. 493, Shults v. State, 37 Neb. 481, supra, V. b. 1, was distinguished upon the ground that in that case the evidence objected to was whether the prisoner did in fact know the difference between right and wrong.

And the opinion of a witness as to whether a person accused of crime could distinguish between right and wrong, who had stated that he knew him some years since, will be taken as referring to the period of his acquaintance with him up to the time he last saw him before the offense, and not to the time of the trial. Powell v. State, 25 Ala. 21.

So, a witness who is competent to give his opinion as to the mental condition of the accused in a criminal action may state his opinion as to the degree of capacity or incapacity by reason of the disorder with which the accused is afflicted. United States v. Guiteau, 1 Mackey, 493, 47 Am. Rep. 247.

And a nonexpert witness may testify that the accused acted like a man of understanding and discretion, or that he had no idea that he was deranged, or that he appeared to be perfectly in possession of his faculties, or that there was no appearance of derangement, or that he was perfectly rational, or that he had not the use of his reason. State v. Ryan, cited in Jarman on Wills, p. 122 note.

And a witness who had arrested a person accused of crime and taken him to jail may, after describing the appearance and manner of the accused during that time and detailing what he said and did, give his opinion as to whether he was being controlled by or suffering under an insane delusion with reference to the alleged criminal act. Bolling v. State, 54 Ark. 568.

But refusal to permit a nonexpert witness to state from facts within his personal knowledge which he had related upon the witness stand what was his opinion as to the sanity or insanity of a person whose mental condition was in question, is not error where he is permitted to state that during the times he had seen him he had always considered him irrational when excited. State v. Leehman, 2 S. D. 171.

And refusal to permit a nonexpert witness, who had stated how the accused acted and talked, especially on the day of the homicide, to state whether or not he talked like a sane or insane man during the night, is not a violation of the rule that nonexpert witnesses may give their opinions as to the sanity of an individual after having first testi-homicide, and where there can be scarcely a doubt that the accused committed it, although he does not expressly so admit in his plea, the defense mainly relied on being that of insanity at the time of the killing, it was depriving the accused of a very great right when he was forced to trial in the absence of these four witnesses, who knew the facts that were material to his defense, and whose presence was important to the proper determination of the issue. It is especially so in the present case, when the record shows that there was much evidence for the state to show that the accused was sane. The large amount of evidence for the state fied to his actions, declarations, general demeanor, and peculiarities. Blanton v. State, 1 Wash. 285.

So, evidence of the mental capacity of a person accused of crime is not admissible upon a prosecution therefor when offered, not for the purpose of proving him non compos mentis, but as a measure of his intellectual capacity. Patterson v. People, 46 Barb. 625.

And a nonexpert witness in a criminal prosecution cannot testify as to whether he had discovered the accused to be a man of very weak mind. Gardiner v. People, 6 Park. Crim. Rep. 155.

And vague, indefinite expressions of a nonexpert witness in a criminal prosecution, that the person looked and acted like an insane person, are not admissible upon the issue of insanity. Gehrke v. State, 13 Tex. 568.

So, a witness in a trial for murder in which insanity is alleged as a defense, who is not a medical man, cannot state what kind of fits the defendant was affected with. McLean v. State, 16 Ala. 672.

And a witness who has testified to his opinion that the accused was insane cannot be permitted to testify that he had expressed that opinion to his sister two years before the criminal act, and state what his sister said in reply, as that would be mere hearsay. People v. Schmitt, 106 Cal. 43.

2. In civil cases.

Witnesses who had known a testatrix personally, and had opportunities to frequently observe her, may be asked in a will contest to state from what they saw of her, her appearance, and the interviews had with her, what they would say as to her mental condition, and whether or not she was of sound and disposing mind. Shanley's Appeal, 62 Conn. 325.

And the opinions of witnesses as to the capacity of a testator to comprehend his property and make an intelligent disposition thereof by will, are admissible in evidence. Re Pinney, 27 Minn. 230.

And the witness may give his opinion as to whether the testator had mind and intelligence sufficient to enable him to have a reasonable judgment of the amount and value of the property he proposed to will and to whom he was willing it. Bost v. Bost, 87 N. C. 477.

So, a witness in a will contest may testify that when he visited the testator he would look at him with a vacant stare and after speaking with him and telling him who he was he would answer, and that his countenance and appearance indicated childishness. Irish v. Smith, 8 Serg. & R. 573, 11 Am. Dec. 642.

And he may be asked whether the eye-sight of the testator was good enough to have enabled him to recognize him when near him if his mind had been right. Irish v. Smith, 8 Serg. & R. 573, 11 Am. Dec. 642.

Where witnesses in a will contest have given an opinion of the capacity of the testator founded on facts known to them, and conduct within their own observation, however, they cannot be called on to say what their opinion would have been under a different state of affairs. Rambler v. Tryon, 7 Serg. & R. 90, 10 Am. Dec. 444.

And they cannot testify as to what they had declared upon the subject to others. Harrison v. Rowan, 8 Wash. C. C. 580.

So, a witness upon the question of mental capacity should be required to state the measure of capacity in his own language and by such ordinary terms or forms of expression as will best convey his own ideas, and should not be asked as to the party's capacity to transact business intelligently and understandingly. Chickering v. Brooks, 61 Vt. 554.

But a nonexpert witness in a will contest, who has testified fully as to all the facts within her knowledge in relation to the testator's testamentary capacity, may give her opinion as to whether he was of sound mind and able to understand what he was doing, and capable of transacting ordinary business. Keithley v. Stafford, 126 Ill. 507.

And testimony of a witness in a will contest that he would not willingly trust the testator to make an important trade for him is not competent upon the question whether the testator had sufficient mental capacity to make a codicil to his will. Prather v. McClelland, 76 Tex. 574.

So, a witness in an action involving the validity of a deed may be asked whether from the general appearance of the grantor he considered him at the time of the execution thereof capable of making a contract or of transacting important business. Wilkinson v. Pearson, 23 Pa. 117.

And evidence of witnesses in an action in which the issue was as to the soundness or unsoundness of the mind of one for whom a trust had been created, and whether the trust had been executed, to the effect that they had known him from his birth up to the time of testifying, and that he was not of sound mind and capable of managing his property, is competent and admissible. Obeare v. Gray, 73 Ga. 455.

And a witness may give an opinion as to the capacity of a donor to dispose of and manage property to the amount of several hundred dollars in one transaction on a question as to power to make a gift, and the question whether he could understandingly dispose of $500 in government bonds is only objectionable as leading. Melendy v. Spaulding, Clark, 54 Vt. 517.

But refusal to permit a witness in a will contest to state whether the testator had mind enough to know what he was doing in bequeathing his property is not error where the witness was permitted to testify that he was fit to bequeath his things to specified legatees, giving his reason therefor. Daniel v. Daniel, 30 Pa. 191.

And refusal to permit nonexpert witnesses in a will contest to give their opinions as to whether the testatrix had mind enough to understand the paper in contest by reading it, or could have been brought to understand it, where the witnesses knew her well and detailed her conduct and peculiarities from their own observations, is not prejudicial error where the same witnesses testified in substance that she had not mind enough, in their opinion, to make a will and understand its nature and condition. Overall v. Bland, 11 Ky. L. Rep. 371.

So, a witness in an action involving the question of the mental capacity of a party to acquire a settlement may be asked whether he considered him non compos mentis. Westmore v. Sheffield, 56 Vt. 239.

But a question asked a witness in an action for a personal injury claimed to have affected the mind of the person injured, who met such person a few hours after the injury and conversed with him in relation to it, as to whether or not he appeared conscious of what he was talking about, is inadmis-showing the sanity of the accused, instead of being a reason for overruling the motion for a new trial, is a stronger reason for granting one. The refusal of the court to continue his case deprived the accused of the benefit of the four witnesses who, above all others, were needed by him in his trial to meet the mass of evidence showing sanity. The court should have either continued the case for the term, or postponed the trial until a later day, in order that the accused might have secured the attendance of these witnesses, in order that the jury might pass upon the question of their credibility, and the weight to be attached to their testimony.

4. The physician who was the absent witness as not conforming to the rule that a nonexpert witness may give an opinion as to the mental condition of another when he has first stated the facts upon which the opinion is based. Pennsylvania Co. v. Newmeyer, 129 Ind. 401.

VIII. Time to which opinion relates.

Nonexpert witnesses cannot give their opinions that another was insane without designating any particular time when in their judgment such insanity existed and without attempting to state any facts or circumstances or acts indicative of her mental condition. Moors v. Sanford, 2 Kan. App. 242.

And a witness in a will contest on the question of mental incapacity cannot be asked whether or not the testator was of sound mind, without fixing the time to which such question relates. Denning v. Butcher, 91 Iowa, 426.

So, the opinion of a witness as to the insanity of a testator must relate to the time of his examination, and he cannot be required to give his opinion as to capacity previous to that time. Runyan v. Price, 15 Ohio St. 1, 36 Am. Dec. 459.

And the opinion of a witness in a suit to set aside an alleged will on the question of insanity is not admissible where it was an opinion entertained, not at the time of the delivery of the testimony, but several years before, which subsequent consideration and reflection might have satisfied the witnesses to have been erroneous. Runyan v. Price, 15 Ohio St. 1, 36 Am. Dec. 459.

So, the testimony of nonexpert witnesses in a criminal prosecution upon the question of the sanity or insanity of the accused must be confined to occasions upon which the witness testifies to have observed his conduct and appearance. Shults v. State, 37 Neb. 481.

And a recital in a bill of exceptions that the state offered to prove by a witness who had known the prisoner two years before the commission of the alleged offense that the prisoner was in his opinion of sound mind and not insane will be considered to mean that the opinion of a witness referred to the prisoner's mental condition at the time of his previous acquaintance with him, and not at the time of the trial. Powell v. State, 25 Ala. 21.

So, nonexpert witnesses cannot give their opinion in a will contest as to the mental condition of the testator on the day of the execution of the will, when they did not see him on that day. Blake v. Hourke, 74 Iowa, 519.

And after a lapse of more than fifty years with the readiest opportunity at all times to contest a will in the ordinary way the door will not be opened to mere speculative opinion as to the mental condition of the testator. Chase v. Wiens, 59 Md. 475.

But witnesses in a prosecution for murder may give their opinions as to the state of the defendant's mind prior to and at the time of the commission of the act. Baldwin v. State, 12 Mo. 227.

And the fact that a nonexpert witness did not form his opinion at the time he saw and observed the facts testified to by him does not render his opinion upon the question of insanity inadmissible in evidence. Hathaway v. National L. Ins. Co. 43 Vt. 336; New York, C. & St. L. R. Co. v. Luebeck, 157 Ill. 595.

It may be the result of the observation of a continued condition or series of facts. New York, C. & St. L. R. Co. v. Luebeck, 157 Ill. 595.

And a nonexpert witness in an action involving the validity of a deed, who had testified without objection that the mind of the grantor was very weak, and that she did not know what she was about in making the deed, may be permitted to state that she was no more competent to make a deed two weeks after the date of the deed in question than she was before. Goodman v. Sapp, 108 N. C. 477.

IX. Cross-examination, rebuttal, and impeachment.

The fact that hypothetical questions based on facts not within the knowledge of the witness, who is not an expert, were asked on cross-examination, does not render them admissible in a will contest upon the question of testamentary capacity. Pittard v. Foster, 12 Ill. App. 133; Dunham's Appeal, 27 Conn. 192.

And witnesses in a will contest who had given an opinion of the capacity of the testator founded on facts known to them and conduct within their own observation cannot be called upon to say on cross-examination what their opinions would be in a different state of affairs. Rambler v. Tryon, 7 Serg. & R. 90, 10 Am. Dec. 444.

So, a witness in an action to set aside a will upon the ground that the testator was of unsound mind cannot be asked on cross-examination if he would have taken the testator's note during the last years of his life, and if he heard anybody question his sanity. Staver v. Hogan, 120 Ind. 227.

And where a witness in a will contest on the part of the defense states upon cross-examination that he predicated his opinion of the testator's capacity upon what he saw or knew of him, and not particularly upon the evidence of another witness, the latter cannot be asked if he had stated in giving evidence that the testator was irrational and wandering in his conversations or otherwise. Higgins v. Carlton, 28 Md. 115, 32 Am. Dec. 666.

And the prosecuting witnesses in a prosecution for murder cannot be asked on cross-examination whether he believed the accused at the time the shot was fired intended to shoot him, where it does not appear that he had any means of judging as to his intention. State v. Garvey, 11 Minn. 154.

So, questions asked a witness on cross-examination in a will contest as to whether he thought the testator had mind sufficient at the time of making his will to give the directions required therefor are not competent for the purpose of ascertaining the degree of intelligence possessed by the witness in order to enable the court to determine what reliance should be placed on his evidence. Re McCarthy, 55 Hun. 7.

It is within the discretion of the court in a will contest, however, to permit the cross-examination of a witness before allowing his opinion as to the testator's mental capacity to be given. O'Connor v. Madison, 98 Mich. 133; First Nat. Bank v. Wirebach, 12 W. N. C. 150.

And witnesses who detailed facts and expressed opinions upon direct examination touching the mental competency of another witness in the same cause without objection may be asked on cross-examination whether, from their observation and knowledge of her as to which they had testified, the character of her mind was such that she had not ness in the motion above referred to subsequently appeared at the trial, but was compelled to leave the court for providential cause. Before leaving, he requested counsel for the accused to allow him to go upon the stand, and testify, so as not to be required to return to the court, to which request they declined to accede. We do not think that the accused lost any of his rights to complain of the subsequent absence of this witness because his counsel failed to interrupt and change the line of his defense, and the manner in which it was being conducted, so as to place this witness upon the stand in advance an accurate knowledge of facts, or fancied the existence of facts which did not exist. Bricker v. Lightner, 40 Pa. 199.

So, a witness in a prosecution for murder in which insanity was interposed as a defense who had stated at the instance of the defense that the defendant was never just right, may be asked by the state as to his opinion whether the defendant was not intelligent enough to know right from wrong. State v. Porter, 34 Iowa, 181.

And permitting a nonexpert witness to state from what he knew of a person whose sanity is in question, and from what he had seen of him, whether he would be apt to know right from wrong, on cross-examination, is not prejudicial error where he had testified that during the times he had seen him he had always considered him irrational when excited. State v. Leehman, 28 D. 171.

So, a nonexpert witness may be asked on cross-examination, upon an issue of testamentary capacity, whether from his observation and acquaintance he thought the testatrix was mentally incapable of transacting ordinary business, for the purpose of fathoming the extent of his knowledge of her business capacity. Gardiner v. Gardiner, 34 N. Y. 155.

And when he bases his opinion in part upon a contract he may be asked whether he regarded it as reasonable or unreasonable. Pence v. Waugh, 135 Ind. 143.

And a witness in an action in which the mental capacity of a person to select a place of abode was in question, with whom such person had lived for a long time, who had been examined as to such person's mental capacity, may be asked on cross-examination whether he considered him what they call a non compos person. Westmore v. Sheffield, 56 Vt. 239.

So, a witness in a will contest who has expressed a decided opinion as to the mental capacity of the testator may be asked on cross-examination as to any business transaction which he may have had with him at the time he claims to have formed such opinion, and as to the manner in which the testator then conducted himself. Roe v. Taylor, 45 Ill. 485.

And as to whether he thought he was of unsound mind at that time. Pence v. Waugh, 135 Ind. 143.

And where he had stated that he considered the testatrix insane when excited, basing his opinion in part upon what the testatrix said about her husband, he may be asked upon cross-examination what the complaint of the testatrix against her husband was. Foster v. Dickerson, 64 Vt. 233.

And one who bases his opinion in part upon the fact that the testator was an old man may be asked on cross-examination if it is not his belief that as a rule old men are of unsound mind because of failure of memory. Pence v. Waugh, 135 Ind. 143.

And a witness who had testified to facts and circumstances strongly tending to show that the testator was insane before the execution of the will, and that he had tried to buy a piece of land from him at about that time, may be asked on cross-examination if he would have taken the conveyance from him had his proposition to purchase the land been accepted. Rush v. Megee, 36 Ind. 60.

And one who had given his opinion that the testator was of sound mind may be asked upon cross-examination, by way of impeachment, if he had stated out of court that the testator was childish and was going crazy. Staser v. Hogan, 120 Ind. 237.

And where nonexpert witnesses who are not subscribing witnesses are called upon in a will contest by the party opposing the will to testify to facts showing his insanity, and proof is made of declarations at other times that in their opinions the testator was insane, such opinions may be considered by the jury, with the other evidence in chief, to prove testator's insanity. Ware v. Ware, 8 Me. 42.

But a nonexpert witness in an action upon a contract who has testified to facts tending to show that a party to the contract was incompetent at the time of making it by reason of mental imbecility, but who had not given his opinion, cannot be contradicted by showing that he had done acts indicating that he considered such party to be of sound mind. Hubbell v. Bissell, 2 Allen, 156.

And declarations by a devisee showing that the testator was in his opinion of unsound mind are not admissible in evidence in a will contest when others are interested in the establishment of the will. Phelps v. Hartwell, 1 Mass. 71.

But a question asked a nonexpert witness on cross-examination in an action to enforce the provisions of an alleged trust in which the defense of insanity is interposed, who had testified on her examination in chief to many conversations she had had with the party whose sanity is questioned, as well as to many remarks she had heard him make tending to show the condition of his mind, as to what she had heard him say imputing that someone had stolen his tobacco, is not objectionable as calling for the expression of an opinion of the witnesses, and as an invasion of the province of the jury. Haxton v. McClaren, 132 Ind. 235.

So, it is competent to ask a witness upon an inquiry of lunacy on rebuttal whether in his opinion the subject is not of sound mind. Re Vanauken, 10 N. J. Eq. 190.

And the evidence of a jailer as to the conduct of a person accused of crime while in jail and the apparent condition of his mind during that time, is admissible in rebuttal of evidence in behalf of the accused tending to show a general and permanent state of dementia and a diseased condition of the mind. People v. McCarthy, 115 Cal. 255.

And witnesses for the state who knew the accused well for a long time immediately preceding the commission of the criminal act may be asked on rebuttal whether or not they had ever observed anything about him, or in what he said or did, that indicated insanity. State v. Maler, 36 W. Va. 767.

But a nonexpert witness cannot state upon redirect examination his opinion as to whether an irrational man can always know right from wrong, as he is not an expert from whom such an opinion would be competent. State v. Leehman, 28 D. 171.

So, a nonexpert witness introduced by the proponents in a will contest, who simply proves the execution of the will on direct examination, and gives his opinion as to the testator's capacity on cross-examination, cannot be asked for his opinion as to such capacity upon redirect examination upon a hypothetical case. Sagar v. Hogmire (Mich.) 2 Det. L. N. 894.

When a witness testifies in a will contest that the will was duly executed by a competent testator, however, a statement made by him in another action that the instrument was worthless is admissible in evidence for the purpose of impeachment. Beaubien v. Clootte, 12 Mich. 459.

of the time when they had contemplated so doing. It is an important right of the accused to be allowed to introduce his witnesses in the order in which he or his counsel think is to the best interest of his case; and witnesses should not be allowed to dictate to counsel as to when they should be put upon the stand. The failure of counsel to introduce the witness at a time which was inconsistent with the interest of the accused should not, generally, deprive him of his right to complain of the absence of a witness at a subsequent stage of the case, if that absence is in no way occasioned by the accused or his counsel.

But the exclusion of declarations of a witness in a will contest that the testatrix was not competent to make a will cannot be held erroneous on appeal where the objection was that it was necessarily inconsistent with his testimony in chief in which he stated that while she resided with him just after the execution of the will he had observed no change in her mental condition, and gave several accounts of acts and conversations tending to show soundness of mind. Williams v. Spencer, 150 Mass. 346, 5 L. R. A. 790.

As to cross-examination in states not adhering to the general rule as to the admissibility of nonexpert opinions, see supra, II. a.

X. Weight.

a. Generally.

The weight to be given the opinions of nonexpert witnesses as to the sanity of the person in question depends upon a consideration of all of the circumstances under which it was formed. Moore v. Moore, 67 Mo. 182.

And upon the extent and character of the impairment of the mind. Burney v. Torrey, 100 Ala. 157.

And where in an action to set aside a deed upon the ground of mental incapacity of the grantor the opinions of the witnesses seem evenly balanced the court will look to the circumstances concerning the transaction, the history and character of the man, the fairness of the transaction, and the probabilities that one in possession of his faculties would make a transfer of his property in such a case. Hemphill v. Holford, 88 Mich. 293.

It has been said that the opinions of ordinary witnesses as to the sanity of the insured, who committed suicide, in an action on an insurance policy conditioned against liability in case of death by his own hand, is not of great weight. Charter Oak L. Ins. Co. v. Rodell, 95 U. S. 236, 24 L. ed. 433.

And that little or no weight can be given to opinions of nonexpert witnesses as to the mental condition of the defendant in an action for his interdiction. Eloi v. Eloi, 36 La. Ann. 563.

And it has been held that evidence that the defendant had been confined in an insane hospital as an insane man, and the opinion of witnesses that he was still insane, is not sufficient to establish insanity to such an extent as to deprive him of capacity to distinguish between right and wrong. Meyer v. People, 166 Ill. 123.

And that the opinion of a witness who had known another for several years that his mind was rather weak at the time of making the contract in question but was improving, but that his mind was not sufficient for the witness to contract with him, does not prove him to be of unsound mind. Darnell v. Rowland, 30 Ind. 342.

And that the opinions of nonexpert witnesses that a testator's mind was not very strong, and that it had been weakened, and that perhaps it was not entirely sound, will not warrant a finding of testamentary incapacity where the other evidence in the case shows that the testator had mind enough to know the extent and value of his property, the names of all his children and those who might or ought to be the natural objects of his bounty, and was able to hold all these in his mind long enough to dictate and have his will prepared. Barick v. Ulmer, 144 Ind. 25.

The jury in a will contest should not be told, however, that the opinions of persons on the question of insanity who are not experts, though ever so honestly formed, are most unsafe guides for the ascertainment of truth. Burney v. Torrey, 100 Ala. 157.

Neighbors and acquaintances of a person whose sanity is in question, who knew him well and formed their opinions from seeing and observing him for several months almost daily, may give such opinions in evidence, and they are entitled to respectful consideration although they are not medical men. Schlenker v. State, 9 Neb. 241; Com. v. Helmbold, v. Kirkbride, 11 Phila. 427.

But a person who has not been interdicted is not proved to be notoriously insane so that it could not but be known to the party dealing with him, within the provisions of La. Civil Code, art. 1788, by the opinions of five witnesses on the one side that he was feeble in intellect, where, on the other hand, seven witnesses testified as to his being of average intellect. Martinez v. Moll, 46 Fed. Rep. 734.

And where there is a great contrariety of evidence as to the feebleness of a grantor's mind, as, for instance, twelve witnesses for it and nine against it, an admission on the part of his grantee, who was his general agent, that such grantor was incapable of transacting his own business, corroborates the affirmative of the issue, and is sufficient to control the grantee's answer denying the fact of mental incapacity. Brooke v. Berry, 2 Gill, 83.

b. As affected by character, capacity, and opportunity.

The opinion of a witness as to the sanity of a person depends upon his capacity to judge and his opportunity to observe. Burton v. Scott, 3 Rand. (Va.) 399; Burney v. Torrey, 100 Ala. 157; Armstrong v. State, 30 Fla. 170, 17 L. R. A. 484; Sharp v. Merri-man (Mich.), 2 Det. L. N. 390; Wood v. State, 58 Miss 741; Sharp v. Kansas City Cable R. Co. 114 Mo. 94; Clifton v. Clifton, 47 N. J. Eq. 227; Culver v. Haslam, 7 Barb. 314; State v. Kalb, 2 Ohio Legal News, 361.

And the intelligence and honesty of the witness. Clifton v. Clifton, 47 N. J. Eq. 227.

And his freedom from interest and bias. Culver v. Haslam, 7 Barb. 314.

And upon the incidents actually observed. Sharp v. Kansas City Cable R. Co. 114 Mo. 94; Culver v. Haslam, 7 Barb. 314.

The opinions of witnesses as to the sanity of a person are of no value unless it appears that they had adequate means and opportunities for forming a conclusion, but no rule can be laid down declaring what kinds of acquaintances or what opportunities are necessary to entitle them to state an opinion. Beaubien v. Cicotte, 12 Mich. 459.

The testimony of witnesses present at the time of the execution of a contract respecting the capacity of the party is of greater weight than the opinions of other witnesses based upon facts which though true might not be the result of unsoundness of mind. Beverley v. Walden, 20 Gratt. 147.

And where evidence is heard on both sides in an action involving the question of the sanity or insanity of a party to a contract, affirmative testimony of those best acquainted with the person alleged to be insane should outweigh testimony of those who at or about the time of the contract had

5. Following the decision of this court in the case of Carr v. State, 96 Ga. 285, and the cases there cited, the propositions stated in the fifth headnote are too well settled to need further discussion.

6. Where the defense of insanity is relied on, and there is the evidence of expert and nonexpert witnesses who testify as to the sanity of the accused, and who were "parties who associated with the defendant, lived with him, lived in the same community," it was error for the judge to charge the jury that the testimony of expert witnesses was entitled to great weight, and to add, in substance, that the testimony of intimate associates of the accused should be given similar weight. All this testimony is allowed for the purpose of informing the jury as to the truth of the issue.

interviews with him and testified that they saw nothing indicating an insane mind. Emery v. Hoyt, 46 Ill. 258.

So, evidence of witnesses present at the execution of a deed is entitled to particular weight upon the question of competency. Jarrett v. Jarrett, 11 W. Va. 584.

And evidence of notaries who took a grantor's acknowledgment to his deed that he was competent to make it is entitled to great weight. Buckey v. Buckey, 38 W. Va. 168.

And next to physicians and persons who were present at the time of the execution of a deed either as attesting witnesses or otherwise the evidence of persons whose intimacy in the family has given them an opportunity of seeing the grantor at all times and watching the operations of his mind is important upon the question of his capacity to make a deed. Jarrett v. Jarrett, 11 W. Va. 584.

So, where there is a conflict in the evidence in relation to the sanity of a grantor in an action to set aside his deed, the testimony of witnesses relating to the period of time nearest the date of the execution of the deed is entitled to the most weight. Exum v. Canty, 34 Miss. 533.

And in deciding as to the state of a grantor's mind at and before the time of the execution of his deed in an action involving its validity, evidence which contains facts upon which the jury may judge for themselves, given by witnesses who by frequently seeing and conversing with the grantor had full opportunity of forming a judgment as to his state of mind, ought to prevail over general opinions upon the same subject formed by persons who had fewer opportunities for judging. Hoge v. Fisher, Pet. C. C. 163.

So, evidence of witnesses who were present at the execution of a will is entitled to particular weight on the question of testamentary capacity, especially where they are attesting witnesses. Nicholas v. Kershner, 20 W. Va. 251; Kerr v. Lunsford, 31 W. Va. 680, 2 L. R. A. 668.

And greater reliance is to be placed upon the testimony of an impartial and respectable lawyer in regard to the due execution of a will prepared by him than upon that of a nonprofessional witness. Julke v. Adam, 1 Redf. 454.

But the testimony of an attorney who drew a will, tending to show that the testator knew what he was about and comprehended the character of the instrument, cannot be said, as matter of law, to be controlling where there is evidence that the testator was eighty years of age, and of many circumstances occurring at, about, and before the time the will was made indicating an enfeebled mental condition, the force and weight of such circumstances being a question for the determination of the jury. Petrie v. Petrie, 2 Silv. S. C. 438.

And a will will not be set aside on the ground of testamentary incapacity upon the testimony of a number of witnesses, all of whom were related to the testator by blood or affinity, as to his unsoundness of mind, as against that of the three witnesses to the will who had no interest in the disposition, and were unconnected with his family and were apparently free from prejudice, and had abundant opportunity to form a judgment as to his mental condition, that he was of sound mind. Sutton v. Morgan, 30 N. J. Eq. 622.

So, evidence of the neighbors of a party who are of sound judgment and fair powers of observation and who have known him long and well and have had occasion to observe and test the vigor of his mental faculties, and can give the facts upon which their impressions and opinions are based, is ordinarily the most reliable on the question of senile dementia. Hiett v. Shull, 36 W. Va. 563.

And knowledge of the habits of the insured with reference to intemperance, asserted by witnesses in an action upon an insurance policy who were not intimate with him and saw him only occasionally, amounts to no more than the assertion of an opinion, and will not be entitled to equal weight with less positive testimony of other witnesses founded upon a more extensive acquaintance. Knickerbocker L. Ins. Co. v. Foley, 105 U. S. 350, 28 L. ed. 1056.

So, a continuance should be granted because of the absence of a material witness in a criminal prosecution who would testify as to the mental condition of the accused and give his opinion that he was afflicted with kleptomania, though there were other witnesses who gave their opinions upon the same question, where the absent witness was more friendly and intimate with the accused, and had better means of knowing his condition, and was better able to give an opinion as to his mental condition than anyone else. Harris v. State, 13 Tex. App. 287.

It cannot be said, as a matter of law, however, that witnesses in an action to set aside a will, who had less acquaintance with the testator and less opportunities, may not be as reliable witnesses as others who may have had special training, experience, or habits of closely observing people. Cline v. Lindsey, 110 Ind. 337.

In Cline v. Lindsey, 110 Ind. 337, Rush v. Megee, 36 Ind. 69, supra, IX. was distinguished, the court saying that the probability is that in that case the attention of the court was not called to the objection that the instruction invaded the province of the jury.

So, an instruction in an action to set aside a will that the opinion of a witness whose attention had been particularly called to the testatrix, who was familiarly acquainted with her and had frequent opportunities of observing her and the operations of her mind, is entitled to greater weight than that of a witness of equal sagacity, is erroneous as invading the province of the jury by directing them as to the weight of the evidence. Durham v. Smith, 120 Ind. 463; Cline v. Lindsey, 110 Ind. 337; Fulwider v. Ingels, 87 Ind. 414.

c. As affected by the facts and reasons stated.

The opinions of nonexpert witnesses on the question of mental capacity are to be weighed by the facts upon which they are based. Ficus v. Turner, 125 Ind. 48; Rush v. Megee, 36 Ind. 69; Ex parte Schneider, 21 D. C. 433; Clarke v. Sawyer, 3 Sandf. Ch. 351; Wilcox v. State, 34 Tenn. 106; Kinleside v. Harrison, 2 Phillim. Ecol. Rep. 449.

Such facts being of more importance than the opinions. Clarke v. Sawyer, 3 Sandf. Ch. 351; McDaniel's Will, 2 J. J. Marsh. 381.

More opinions of witnesses as to the sanity of a testator are entitled to little or no regard unless they are supported by good reasons founded on and the weight to be given to it is for them. The judge should not intimate in any way to them how they should deal with any particular class of witnesses, but, under proper instructions, leave the entire matter to them. It may be that in certain cases the testimony of non-expert witnesses would, in the mind of an intelligent juror, outweigh the testimony of the alleged expert witnesses, and that in other cases the testimony of the expert would be given the greater weight; but the jury are the sole judges of such things, and the judge should leave them untrammelled to pass upon the credibility of all witnesses, and give such weight to the testimony of each as they see proper.

7. "Where the question under examination, and to be decided by the jury, is one of opinion, any witness may swear to his opinion or belief, giving his reasons therefor." Penal facts which warrant them in the opinion of the jury. Harrison v. Howan, 8 Wash. C. C. 580; Kinne v. Kinne, 9 Conn. 102, 21 Am. Dec. 732; Jamison v. Jamison, 3 Houst. (Del.) 108; McDaniel's Will, 2 J. J. Marsh. 381; Jones v. Perkins, 5 B. Mon. 222; Chase v. Winans, 59 Md. 475; Clifton v. Clifton, 47 N. J. Eq. 227; Sloan v. Maxwell, 8 N. J. Eq. 563; Lowe v. Williamson, 2 N. J. Eq. 82; Whitenack v. Stryker, 2 N. J. Eq. 8; Doran v. McConlogue, 150 Pa. 98; Nexsen v. Nexsen, 2 Keyes, 232; Young v. Barner, 27 Gratt. 36; Jarrett v. Jarrett, 11 W. Va. 584; Kerr v. Lunsford, 81 W. Va. 680, 2 L. R. A. 683.

And if such reasons are frivolous and inconclusive the opinions are worth nothing. Kinne v. Kinne, 9 Conn. 102, 21 Am. Dec. 732; Sloan v. Maxwell, 8 N. J. Eq. 563.

The weight to be given to an opinion of a non-expert witness as to mental capacity when admissible will depend upon the extent and character of the impairments of the mind, the opportunity to know and intelligence of the witness, and the reasonableness of the conclusion from the facts stated and the accompanying opinion. Burney v. Torrey, 100 Ala. 157.

In Burney v. Torrey, 100 Ala. 157, Roberts v. Trawick, 13 Ala. 68, supra, VI. b, was distinguished upon the ground that in that case the court was laying down a rule for the trial court and giving the reasons for the admission or rejection of certain facts as evidence, and not a rule for the guidance of jurors after such evidence had been admitted.

So, the opinions of witnesses other than attesting witnesses as to the capacity of a testator are to be received in a will contest as the least kind of evidence of testamentary capacity except so far as they are based on facts and occurrences detailed by them; the witnesses are to state the facts, and it is the business of the court from these facts to pronounce the opinion, under settled rules and guides, whether the testator is competent or not. Whitenack v. Stryker, 2 N. J. Eq. 8.

And the opinions of witnesses as to a want of testamentary capacity are entitled to but little weight in a will contest as against proof of facts evincing sufficient testamentary capacity. Carpenter v. Calvert, 83 Ill. 62.

And evidence, consisting particularly of the testimony of nonexpert witnesses that the testatrix was not fit to make a will, many of whom seldom saw her and all of whom gave no facts upon which to base their opinions, or facts too weak and inconclusive to warrant it, is insufficient to warrant the submission of the issue of testamentary capacity to the jury. Green's Estate, 140 Pa. 137.

But it is not correct to say that the opinion of a witness as to the mental condition of the testatrix in a will contest is entitled to consideration only so far as the facts stated by him sustain the opinion, unless the proposition is understood to include among the facts referred to the acquaintance of the witness with the subject-matter and his opportunities for observation. Shanley's Appeal, 62 Conn. 325.

And an instruction in a prosecution for homicide in which insanity was interposed as a defense, that the conduct, language, and appearance of the accused should be considered for the double purpose of testing the value of the opinions of witnesses based upon such facts and of determining whether the fact of insanity is established independently of such opinions, is not subject to the objection that it tells the jury that if they find the accused insane they must do so from facts independent from opinions, where they are elsewhere told that weight and credit should be given to opinions upon the question of insanity. State v. Jones, 64 Iowa, 356.

And the fact that a nonexpert witness in a will contest is unable to give conversations with the testator, and can only state the manner in which he conversed, and that the facts known to him were limited in their character, does not render his opinion on the question of mental capacity inadmissible, but it is for the jury to say what credit and weight should be given to the opinion in view of the character of the dealings and conversations upon which it is based. Foster v. Dickerson, 64 Vt. 233.

d. As compared with expert and other evidence.

See principal case; and see note, Expert opinions as to sanity or insanity, to Burt v. State (Tex. Crim. App.) 40 S. W. 1000, — L. R. A. —.

e. A question for the jury.

The weight and effect which shall be given the opinion of a nonexpert witness on a question as to mental soundness is a question of fact for the jury. Colee v. State, 75 Ind. 513; Newhard v. Yundt, 132 Pa. 324; Foster v. Dickerson, 64 Vt. 233.

Upon consideration of the facts testified to by them upon which such opinions are based. State v. Hayden, 51 Vt. 236.

So, whether the means of information or facts proved or the conclusions drawn by a nonexpert witness as to the sanity or insanity of a person are sufficient to base their conclusions upon, is a question for the consideration of the jury under proper instructions. McClackey v. State, 5 Tex. App. 330.

And the reasons of witnesses for their opinions on a question of mental soundness in a proceeding in which the question of sanity is involved are for the consideration of the jury, and not of the court. Gray v. Obeare, 59 Ga. 675.

Opinions of nonexpert witnesses upon the question of insanity are only to be received and weighed in the light of the facts and circumstances related by them and upon which their opinions are predicated, and the jury must judge of the reasonableness of their opinions and conclusions from these facts and circumstances. Wilcox v. State, 94 Tenn. 106; Nexsen v. Nexsen, 2 Keyes, 232.

And it is for the jury to consider the facts and ascertain if the opinions are sustained by them. Nexsen v. Nexsen, 2 Keyes, 232; Petrie v. Petrie, 2 Silv. S. C. 438.

The contrariety of opinion as to mental capacity and the veracity of the witnesses in a will contest are matters peculiarly within the province of the jury with which the court has nothing to do, and an instruction that the testimony of witnesses who depose that the testatrix was of perfect mind and memory is to be preferred to the testimony of those to the contrary, is properly refused. Newhard v. Yundt, 132 Pa. 324.

F. H. B.

Code, § 1021. There seems to have been no violation of this well-settled rule in regard to the nonexpert witnesses in this case. Each witness examined was allowed to state his opinion, and no one did so without giving his reasons therefor. The opinion and the reasons go to the jury together, that the jury may determine what the opinion is worth. It may be that a particular reason given for an opinion is not really a good one, and such a reason would most probably, in the mind of an intelligent juror, destroy the opinion at once; but, nevertheless, the opinion and the reason ought to be considered, that the jury may give the opinion such weight as they think proper.

8. When a jury is about to be impaneled for the trial of a felony case, and the panel is "put upon the accused," and the names of the individual jurors are being called, it is competent for the state or the accused to make certain objections to each juror as he is called. Penal Code, § 978. Upon such objections being made to a juror, it is the "duty of the court to hear immediately such evidence as may be submitted (the juror being a competent witness) in relation to the truth of these objections." On this issue the juror may be called as a witness, either by the party attacking his competency or the party seeking to establish it. If in this investigation the juror is held to be competent, the next step is to place him upon his voir dire, and ask him the questions prescribed in Penal Code, § 975. If he answers these questions so as to qualify himself as a juror, the judge is not required, when the juror is placed upon him as a trier, to ask the juror any question in regard to his competency, nor to permit counsel to do so. (Certainly neither the court nor counsel should ask any question which would involve a breach of the juror's privilege to refuse to answer on the ground that so doing would tend to incriminate, or otherwise disgrace, him; and neither the court itself should ask any question, nor should it permit counsel to ask any question, of the juror, until extrinsic evidence has been introduced tending to show that the juror has answered the questions, or some of them, falsely, thereby impeaching or attacking his competency. On this investigation the juror is not a competent witness in the broad sense in which the term is used when the challenge is for cause on one of the grounds stated in Penal Code, § 978. If the challenge for cause is overruled, and if the juror answers the statutory questions so as to qualify himself, he stands before the court as a competent juror, and he cannot be called upon to disqualify himself; and, if placed upon the court as a trier, and his disqualification is brought to the attention of the court by evidence other than that of the juror, then the court should determine the question as to whether he is a competent juror or not, and ask him such questions only as he, under the law, would be compelled to answer if called as an ordinary witness, and then determine his competency from the extrinsic evidence, as well as the statement of the juror. No fixed rule can be laid down to be followed in all cases. The inquiry which the judge should make after the juror's competency is attacked by extrinsic evidence is to be left largely to the discretion of the trial judge, according to the circumstances of each case.

9. While the accused mainly relied upon the defense of insanity, still, as he did not expressly admit that he committed the homicide, the court should not, in its instructions to the jury, have referred to the homicide, as "the act which the accused committed. But, as counsel for the accused, in numerous requests which were made to the judge to charge, used similar language, this error on the part of the judge would not have necessitated a new trial, even though the requests containing the language were not actually given by the judge. Counsel for the accused should not, in their communications with the court in requests to charge, use language which would be calculated to mislead the court as to the contentions of the accused, and then afterwards complain that the language used, upon being subsequently adopted by the court, was calculated to prejudice the case of the accused. Of course, if the requests containing the language had been given, there would be no question, but it seems to us that, where the requests gave to the judge language which he used in his charge, independently of the requests, the language ought not to be the subject of complaint at the instance of the accused. However, in cases where the accused does not expressly admit that he committed the act, it is not good practice for the judge to use such expressions as those above quoted.

10. The charge of the court was, in the main, correct and appropriate; and considering it as a whole, except as herein criticised, was free from material error. The instructions as to the law of insanity were in accord with the decisions of this court cited above.

11. It is not necessary to decide in this case whether this court has the power to review the decision of the judge of the superior court upon a motion to change the venue in a criminal case under the act of 1895 (Acts 1895, pp. 70, 71). Even if this court has the power to review such a decision, there is no present occasion for exercising it, as the circumstances and surroundings of the case when the accused is again put upon trial may, and probably will, be essentially different from what they were at the time the change of venue was requested.

12. We have dealt with all of the substantial errors committed at the trial relating to any matter or question that is the least likely to arise when the case is tried again, and hence we do not deal more specifically with the numerous grounds of the motion for a new trial.

Judgment reversed.

Mrs. J. C. MERRITT, Plff. in Err.,

v.

GATE CITY NATIONAL BANK.

(.....Ga.....)

*1. Under an act providing that all cases brought in a designated city court should be "returnable to and triable at the term next ensuing after twenty days have elapsed from the filing" a case in that court, the declaration in which was filed on the 12th day of June, 1894, was ripe for trial at the ensuing July term, which began on the 1st Monday of that month. This is true although the last of the twenty days prescribed by the statute in this instance fell upon the Sabbath day.

2. A plea to an action brought by the plaintiff as the Gate City National Bank, which alleged that "the said Gate City National Bank has been dissolved by a forfeiture of its charter, and by misuser of its franchises," was good against a general demurrer or mere motion to strike. It will be presumed, as against such a demurrer or motion, that the charter of the bank in question was forfeited in the manner prescribed by law.

3. The drawer of a check upon a bank is not absolved from liability thereon because of any delay in presenting the check for payment, when it does not appear that any loss resulted to the drawer from such delay; and in a suit upon such a check against the drawer, a plea by him, alleging the delay, but silent as to loss, was properly stricken on demurrer.

(January 21, 1897.)

ERROR to the City Court of Atlanta to review a judgment in favor of plaintiff in an action brought to hold the drawer of a check liable for its amount. Reversed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Mr. Robert L. Rodgers, for plaintiff in error:

The first, or filing day, is not to be counted, as the law prescribes that cases shall be returnable to and triable at the term next "ensuing after twenty days from the filing," etc.

It requires both days, the filing day, "12th day of June, 1894," and the 1st day of July, Sunday, the last day before the term, to make the twenty days; that is counting the first and last day, also counts Sunday the last day, and is not twenty days from the day of filing, June 12.

Sunday is not a judicial day.

In computing the time, according to the rule recognized in Cromlien v. Brink, 30 Pa. 522, the day on which the payment was made must be excluded.

* Headnotes by SIMMONS, Ch. J.

NOTE.—For the computation of time by excluding the last day when it falls on Sunday, see note to Brown v. Valles (Colo.) 14 L. R. A. 120; also Hanover F. Ins. Co. v. Shrader (Tex.) 30 L. R. A. 498.

If the Gate City National Bank was no longer a corporation doing a regular banking business, but was in a state of dissolution, then it had no right to sue as a living corporation.

Code 1882, § 1688.

The transaction of giving defendant's check for her husband's debt, taking up his note, was "absolutely void" in law, and the parties cannot make valid by their wishes, or by suit at law, a transaction which the law declares to be "absolutely void."

Mr. S. J. Hall, for defendant in error:

Original petitions in the city and superior court must be filed in the clerk's office at least twenty days before the term to which it is returnable.

Ga. Code 1882, § 8338.

The maker of an acceptance cannot plead the disability of the holder thereof to sue.

Southern Bank v. Williams, 25 Ga. 534.

There is nothing to show that the plaintiff in error was in any wise damaged by the check in question not having been presented for payment at an earlier date; therefore the plea that plaintiff in error was discharged from liability on account of the delay in presenting the check for payment was properly stricken.

Daniels v. Kyle, 1 Ga. 304; Daniels v. Kyle, 5 Ga. 245; Prescott v. Bennett, 50 Ga. 274.

SIMMONS, Ch. J., delivered the opinion of the court:

1. This was an action in the city court of Atlanta, filed June 12, 1894, and made returnable to the July term, 1894, which began on Monday, July 2. The act of November 30, 1892, establishing new terms for that court, provides that "all cases brought in said court shall be returnable to and triable at the term next ensuing after twenty days have elapsed from the filing, . . . the purpose of this act being to require a case to be filed twenty days before the term to which it is returnable." Acts 1892, p. 220. A plea to the jurisdiction on the ground that the suit was not filed twenty days before the term to which it was returnable was stricken by the court on demurrer, and to this the defendant excepted. The court was right in striking this plea. Counsel for the plaintiff in error relied upon that section of the Code which provides that, "when a number of days is prescribed for the exercise of any privilege or the discharge of any duty, only the first or last day shall be counted; and if the last day shall fall on the Sabbath, another day shall be allowed in the computation." Code 1882, § 4. Here, however, there was nothing to be done on the last day, and it therefore made no difference that it fell on the Sabbath. The provision as to the time of filing suits in the city court of Atlanta is similar to that which regulates the time of filing in the superior court, the law requiring that actions in the latter court shall be filed at least twenty days before the term to which they are returnable (Civ. Code, § 4984); and the regular terms of the superior court begin, as do those of the city court of Atlanta, on Monday. For nearly a century the law with reference to the superior court has been the same in this respect as it is now; yet as far back as our knowledge extends it has been the practice in that court to treat Tuesday, twenty days before the term, as the last return day for the term; thus including Sunday as the last of the twenty days. The uniform practice of the courts in this respect for so long a period, if not controlling in the construction of the law, is at least entitled to great weight; and we are not disposed at this late day to question its legality; especially since a holding that the practice is wrong would result in widespread and incalculable harm.

2. The defendant further pleaded that "the alleged plaintiff, the Gate City National Bank, has gone into dissolution, and is not now in business, and was not so at the time of filing this suit; and as a dead and defunct corporation it has no right to be plaintiff in a suit. The said Gate City National Bank has been dissolved by a forfeiture of its charter and by misuser of its franchises." The plaintiff demurred generally to this plea. The court sustained the demurrer, and struck the plea, and to this the defendant excepted. We think this plea was good as against a mere general demurrer. Although the plea does not allege in what manner the charter was forfeited, it will, as against a general demurrer, be presumed that it was forfeited in the manner prescribed by law; and, this being so, the action could not be maintained in the name of the corporation. The corporate right to sue, when not prolonged by statute for the purpose of winding up the affairs of the corporation, dies with the charter. There can be no suit by a dead person, whether natural or artificial. In this respect a dead corporation stands upon no better footing than a dead man. See Van Pelt v. Home Bldg. & L. Assn. 87 Ga. 370; 6 Thomp. Corp. §§ 6721, 6723, 7870.

3. The court did not err in striking the third plea of the defendant, which was that it was the fault of the plaintiff that the check sued upon was not paid, the reason why it was not paid being that the plaintiff negligently failed to present it in proper time at the bank upon which it was drawn. It does not appear from the plea that the defendant, the drawer of the check, was hurt by the delay; and it is well settled that the drawer of a check upon a bank is not absolved from liability thereon because of any delay in presenting it for payment, when it does not appear that loss resulted to the drawer. Daniels v. Kyle, 1 Ga. 304, 5 Ga. 245; Carswell v. Ware, 80 Ga. 267; Comer v. Dufour, 95 Ga. 378, 30 L. R. A. 800.

On account of the error in striking the plea dealt with in the second division of this opinion, the judgment of the court below is reversed.

CHICAGO, BURLINGTON, & QUINCY RAILROAD COMPANY.

(189 Ill. 312.)

1. A contract by a railroad employee which gives him his election, after an injury, to take the benefits of a relief fund to which he as well as the railroad company has contributed, or to sue for damages in a court of law, and providing that his acceptance of such benefits will release the employer from liability, is not contrary to public policy.
2. An acceptance of benefits from a relief fund to which a railroad company has largely contributed, by an employee who knows that this, under his contract, will have the effect to release the railroad company from liability

APPEAL by plaintiff from a judgment of the Appellate Court, First District, affirming a judgment of the Superior Court for Cook County in favor of defendant in an action brought to recover damages for personal injuries alleged to have been caused by defendant's negligence. Affirmed.

Statement by Carter, J.:

This was an action on the case in the superior court of Cook county, by Charles H. Eckman, the appellant, against the Chicago, Burlington, & Quincy Railroad Company, the appellee, for damages for injuries sustained while in the service of appellee at Buda, Illinois. The declaration charged that the injury was caused by the negligence and recklessness of the defendant. A plea of the general issue was entered, and a trial had before a jury. The evidence showed that on August 29, 1891, while a freight train was standing on the main track, the appellant was directed by the foreman to crawl under the engine, and tighten up a valve, and while so under the engine another train ran into the rear end of the freight train, thereby forcing the engine forward, and dragging appellant quite a distance, breaking his leg and ankle, etc., whereby he was seriously injured. The railroad company relied upon the fact that the plaintiff was a member of the Burlington Voluntary Relief Department, and that he had received the benefits provided by that department, as a complete defense. The Burlington Relief Department was organized June 1, 1889, pursuant to a resolution of the board of directors of the appellee company, and its object is declared to be "the establishment and management of a fund, to be known as the 'Relief Fund,' for the payment of definite amounts to employees contributing thereto, who are to be known as 'members of the relief fund,' when, under the regulations, they are entitled to such payment, by reason of accident or sickness, or, in the event of their death, to the relative or other beneficiaries designated by them." This fund consists of voluntary contributions from the employees, income derived from investments and from interest paid by the company, and appropriations by the company, when necessary to make up deficiencies. The railroad company has general charge of the department, guarantees the fulfillment of its obligations, pays interest at 4 per cent per annum on monthly balances in its hands, supplies all the necessary facilities for conducting the business of the department, and pays all its operating expenses. There is also an advisory committee, having general supervision of the department, which consists of the general manager of the appellee as chairman, six members selected by the employees of the different divisions of the railroad company, and six members selected by the board of directors of the company; the chairman having no voice except in case of a tie. The company agrees to pay any deficiency in the amount required to meet the claims on the fund. No employee is required to become a member of the relief fund, and any member may withdraw altogether at the end of any month. The members are divided into different classes, depending upon the amount of their contributions. Each member contributes monthly a specified sum according to the class to which he belongs, which is deducted from his wages, and placed to the credit of the relief fund. All employees of the company who pass a satisfactory medical examination are eligible for membership. If a contributing member is under disability,—that is, if he is unable to work,—whether such a disability arises from an injury received while at work or from sickness, he is entitled to be paid from the fund a certain sum per day, varying according to the contribution which he is making. In case of his death, the beneficiary designated by him is entitled to be paid a specified sum as designated in the membership contract. The regulations also provide a form of application which was used by the appellant, in which the appellant agrees to be bound by the regulations of the relief department; that a certain specified portion of his wages shall be applied as a voluntary contribution for the purpose of securing the benefits provided; that this application, on approval by the superintendent of the relief department, shall make him a member of the relief fund, and constitute a contract between him and the company; that his leaving the employment of or discharge by the company shall terminate the contract, except as to benefits accrued and as to death benefits. It also appoints the beneficiaries in case of death, and contains the following agreement: "I also agree that, in consideration of the amounts paid and to be paid by said company for the maintenance of said relief department, and of the guaranty by said company of the payment of said benefits, the acceptance by me of benefits for injury shall operate as a release and satisfaction of all claims against said company and all other companies associated therewith in the administration of their relief departments, for damages arising from or growing out of said injury." The regulations provide further that, should a member or his legal representative bring suit against the company for damages on account of injury or death of such member, payment of benefits on account of the same shall not be made until such suit is discontinued; and that, if the suit shall proceed to judgment, or be compromised, all claims on the relief fund for benefits on account of such injury or death shall be thereby precluded. The relief department, as we have seen, was organized on June 1, 1889. August 31, 1891, two days after the accident to the appellant, the appellee had paid for operating expenses alone of the relief department, $83,958.98. It had also advanced towards the payment of benefits during such time, on account of the insufficiency of contributions of members, the sum of $10,128.19. From June 1, 1889, to April 30, 1892 (this suit having been brought on May 4, 1892) the appellee paid for operating expenses of the relief department from its funds $110,588.68. On December 31, 1891, in accordance with its regulations, it crossed off charges against the relief fund for deficiencies which occurred up to that time, amounting to $20,275.55. It had advanced on account of further deficiencies occurring from January 1, 1892, to April 30, 1892, the sum of $19,441.27,—making a total paid and advanced by the company from June 1, 1889, to April 30, 1892, of $150,255.45. The amount paid on account of sickness and death from sickness from June 1, 1889, to April 30, 1892, was $225,978, and the amount paid on account of accident and death from accident was $240,261.49. This latter amount includes accident benefits, whether the injury was received while the employee was on or off duty. In addition, the appellee railroad company had given office rent to the department, and also the services of the officials and clerks of the operating department in transacting the relief-department business, for all of which no charge was made. The contributions of the members have never been applied to any other purpose than the payment of benefits. No part of it has ever been used for the payment of expenses. At the close of 1890 the membership of the relief department was 9,407; at the close of 1891 it was 10,386. At the close of 1892 it was 12,283. During those periods the number of men employed was somewhere between 25,000 and 30,000. The appellant, Eckman, made application for membership in the Burlington Voluntary Relief Department, July 18, 1890, which application was approved August 4, 1890. It provided that $2.10 should be deducted from his wages monthly for the purpose of securing the benefits provided for a member of the second class, with twice additional death benefit of the first class. These benefits, as shown by the book of regulations, were, for disability by reason of accident, $1 for each day of a period not to exceed fifty-two weeks, with 50 cents a day thereafter during the continuance of the disability. Any bills for surgical attendance were to be paid by the relief department. The two additional death benefits of the first class were $250 each, which with the $500 belonging to the second class, made the total death benefit $1,000 to which his beneficiary would have been entitled in case of death. The appellant received $245 for benefits, being the amount he was entitled to under the regulations. There was also paid on account of the appellant for nurses, medicine, and surgical attendance the sum of $121.90. The receipt of these amounts as benefits due him from the relief fund was not disputed. The appellant claims that he joined the relief department by coercion, and that when he received the first payment he was not conscious what he was doing, on account of being under the influence of opiates at the time, and that, therefore, he had not made a conscious election between the two alternatives offered him by the relief fund,—either to accept its benefits, or to abide the event of a suit for damages,—its rules precluding a member from doing both. The court instructed the jury to find for the defendant below, the appellee here. Appellant appealed to the appellate court for the first district, which court affirmed the judgment, from which judgment he has appealed to this court.

Carter, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The real controversy in this case is not whether the injury to the appellant, complained of, was caused by the negligence of the appellee company, but whether the receipt by the appellant of the benefits provided by the company under its contract with the appellant through its relief department, mentioned in the record as the Burlington Voluntary Relief Department, after the happening of the injury, constituted a sufficient defense to the action. It was not disputed that after the happening of the injury appellant received through this department of the company in instalments, from time to time, the aggregate sum of $245 as such benefits on account of the injury and under his contract of membership, and that there was also disbursed by said department for appellant for nurses, medicine, and surgical attendance the sum of $131.90. But it is contended, in the first place, by appellant, that the company could not, by a contract in advance, exempt itself from liability to its employees for its gross negligence; that such a contract would be contrary to public policy, and void. The correctness of this position is undoubted, and it is not disputed on behalf of the appellee, but its contention is that the contract here in question is not of that character; that, on the contrary, it merely provided for an accord and satisfaction after the injury has been received, and at the election of the injured employee, and that after the injury in this case there was such accord and satisfaction, and that the same is a complete bar to a recovery in this suit. Contracts of this character have been the subject of judicial investigation in many cases in different states, and it has been almost uniformly held, where the question has arisen as in this case, that they are not void as being against a sound public policy. As said in Chicago, B. & Q. R. Co. v. Miller, 40 U. S. App. 448, 22 C. C. A. 264, 76 Fed. Rep. 489, by the United States circuit court of appeals for the eighth district: "The various courts which have had this question under consideration appear to agree that the stipulation in question is not opposed to sound public policy, but on the whole is conducive to the well-being of those whom it immediately affects, inasmuch as many railroad employees, owing to the dangerous character of their employment, are hurt without any culpable negligence on the part of their employer, and inasmuch as the employee retains, until after he sustains an injury, the right to elect whether he will sue his employer for negligence or accept benefits from the association. It also appears to be agreed that the obligation assumed by the employer to maintain and support such association by contributing the funds necessary for that purpose creates a privity of contract between the employer and all the members of the association, and at the same time furnishes a sufficient consideration to support such contract." Substantially the same language and reasoning have been used in the following cases, all of which tain the sufficiency of such a defense: Maine v. Chicago, B. & Q. R. Co. (Iowa) 70 N. W. 630; Chicago, B. & Q. R. Co. v. Bell, 41 Neb. 44; Donald v. Chicago, B. & Q. R. Co. 93 Iowa, 284, 33 L. R. A. 492; Chicago, B. & Q. R. Co. v. Wymore, 40 Neb. 645; Vickers v. Chicago, B. & Q. R. Co. 71 Fed. Rep. 139; Leas v. Pennsylvania Co. 10 Ind. App. 47; King v. Pennsylvania R. Co. 164 Pa. 529; Shaver v. Pennsylvania Co. 71 Fed. Rep. 931; Otis v. Pennsylvania Co. 71 Fed. Rep. 136; Johnson v. Philadelphia & R. R. Co. 163 Pa. 127; Spitze v. Baltimore & O. R. Co. 75 Md. 162; Fuller v. Baltimore & O. Employees' Relief Assn. 87 Md. 433; Graft v. Baltimore & O. R. Co. (Pa.) 6 Cent. Rep. 693; Martin v. Baltimore & O. R. Co. 41 Fed. Rep. 125; State, Black, v. Baltimore & O. R. Co. 86 Fed. Rep. 655; Owens v. Baltimore & O. R. Co. 35 Fed. Rep. 715, 1 L. R. A. 75; Griffiths v. Earl Dudley, L. R. 9 Q. B. Div. 357; Clements v. London & N.W. R. Co. [1894] 2 Q. B. 482; O'Neil v. Lake Superior Iron Co. 63 Mich. 690.

The only case to which our attention has been called that is said to announce a contrary doctrine is Miller v. Chicago, B. & Q. R. Co. 65 Fed. Rep. 305. This case went out on a demurrer to the answer, and is the same case referred to above as Chicago, B. & Q. R. Co. v. Miller, 40 U. S. App. 448, 22 C. C. A. 264, 76 Fed. Rep. 439. On appeal to the circuit court of appeals that court used the language quoted above, conceding that such propositions were supported by adequate authority, but held the judgment of the lower court on the demurrer correct, and pointed out specifically wherein the answer was insufficient, although the lower court placed its decision on a different ground, holding the contract itself insufficient to bar the suit for damages. In the case at bar the appellee contributes largely to the fund under its agreement to make up or guarantee deficits, to furnish surgical aid and attendance, to pay all the expenses of the administration and management, and to become responsible for the safe-keeping of the funds of the relief department. Such contributions by the appellee to the relief department would be sufficient consideration for a discharge of the appellee's liability to appellant for the injury sustained, after he accepted the benefits of the fund so maintained. Nor does the fact that the fund was in part formed by his contributions to it alter the case. The agreement that the acceptance of the benefits for the injury from the relief fund should operate as a release and satisfaction of all claims against the company on account of such injury cannot be construed as a provision exempting the company from liability for its own negligence. As said in Johnson v. Philadelphia & R. R. Co. 163 Pa. 127: "The benefits, by the regulations of the relief association, become due to members whenever disabled by accident in the railroad company's service, or by sickness or injury other than in the company's service, without reference to the question of negligence at all. As these provisions include benefits in cases of accident pure and simple, of injury by the negligence of fellow workmen, and by the member's own contributory negligence, it is apparent that they cover a wide field, in which there is no liability of the railroad company at all. Such cases are probably a large majority of those occurring to railroad employees, and the association therefore is of the highest order of beneficial societies. But even in cases of injury through the company's negligence there is no waiver of any right of action that the person injured may thereafter be entitled to. It is not the signing of the contract, but the acceptance of benefits after the accident, that constitutes the release. The injured party therefore is not stipulating for the future but settling for the past; he is not agreeing to exempt the company from liability for negligence, but accepting compensation for an injury already caused thereby. He may as well accept it in instalments as in a single sum, and from an appointed fund to which the company has contributed as from the company's treasury as a result of litigation. The substantial feature of the contract which distinguishes it from those held void as against public policy is that the party retains whatever right of action he may have until after knowledge of all the facts, and an opportunity to make his choice between the sure benefits of the association or the chances of litigation. Having accepted the former he cannot justly ask the latter in addition." In every case of injury the injured party has a right to compromise the damages for any valuable consideration, no matter how small; and, if he chooses to accept a smaller amount than he might have been able to secure at the hands of a jury, such settlement is nevertheless a full accord and satisfaction, and a bar to the prosecution of any suit for damages for such injuries. It is well known that railroad companies frequently compromise such suits out of court, and such compromises are always upheld, if honestly and fairly made. Here is an agreement made between the railroad company and the appellant that the acceptance of the benefits should release the railroad company from responding in damages as the result of an action at law. It is not this agreement alone that constitutes the release, but the acceptance of the benefits therein stipulated, well knowing that the acceptance of such benefits will have the effect of a release. That the appellant knew what the effect of the acceptance of the benefits was is not disputed. He was furnished with a handbook, which plainly stated that an injured member may either accept the benefits of the fund, or rely upon the issue of a suit; that he cannot do both. The agreement is not against public policy, as it merely puts the employee to his election, after an injury had been sustained by him, either to take the benefits of the relief fund, to which the appellee has materially contributed, or to sue for damages in a court at law.

Appellant's next contention is that the appellee had no right to go into the insurance business, and that the whole relief department scheme is both illegal under the insurance laws of this state, and ultra vires of a railroad corporation. The Burlington Voluntary Relief Department is not incorporated as such, but is managed, as has been stated, by some of the officials of the appellee, and the appellee contributes funds to it. The application was made to the superintendent of the relief department of the Chicago, Burlington, & Quincy Railroad Company. The relief department is composed of the appellee and six other railroad corporations and certain of the employees of the same. That such relief department is not an insurance company has been held in Donald v. Chicago, B. & Q. R. Co. 98 Iowa, 284, 83 L. R. A. 492, and in Johnson v. Philadelphia & R. R. Co. 163 Pa. 127. The latter part of § 81 of chapter 82 of the Revised Statutes of Illinois of 1881, as amended in 1883, provides that "associations and societies which are intended to benefit the widows, orphans, heirs, and devisees of deceased members thereof, and members who have received a permanent disability, and where no annual dues or premiums are required, and where the members shall receive no money as profit or otherwise, except for permanent disability, shall not be deemed insurance companies." While sick benefits, such as are usually paid by secret and fraternal societies, are not mentioned in express terms in the section quoted, we think they may be fairly construed to be within the spirit of the same. In fact, no mention of the payment of sick benefits occurs in any of our insurance statutes until the statute of 1893 on fraternal beneficiary societies. The business done by the relief department was not prohibited by the statutes relating to insurance companies in force at its organization, nor at the time of the injury to appellant; but whether the contract, where it had not been performed by the payment and receipt of the money, or whether the organization of the relief department would or not be held to be ultra vires the corporation, is a question not necessary to the decision of this case. Appellant cannot invoke that defense against appellee after having received the benefits secured to him by his contract. It is a general rule that a corporation cannot avail itself of the defense of ultra vires where a contract not immoral in itself, nor forbidden by any statute, has been in good faith fully performed by the other party, and the corporation has had the full benefit of its performance. McNulta v. Corn Belt Bank, 164 Ill. 427; Kadish v. Garden City Equitable Loan & Bldg. Assn. 151 Ill. 531. And this rule applies with equal force to the other party setting out that the contract was ultra vires the corporation. Kadish v. Garden City Equitable Loan & Bldg. Assn. 151 Ill. 531. Appellant was paid at the rate of $1 a day after he was injured until he began this suit, and then, by the terms of the regulations, the payment of benefits ceased. The appellee paid as it agreed to do, and the appellant has accepted such payment, and the contract has been fully executed. It is therefore immaterial to inquire whether the contract or the organization of the relief department was ultra vires the corporation or not. That question does not properly arise in this case, and we do not, by anything hereinbefore said, intend to express any opinion as to whether or not it would appear, in a direct and proper proceeding on the part of the state, that the appellee corporation has exceeded its charter powers in organizing and maintaining its voluntary relief department.

Certain testimony was offered by appellant, which he contends would have tended to prove that he was coerced into joining the relief department. The substance of this testimony was that he was advised on three different occasions by the superintendent or foreman who had power to discharge him to join the association, and that he did so, not because he desired to, but that, being in the presence of his superior, who had power to discharge him, he felt that he would stand better with the company by signing. It was not claimed or offered to be proved that he made any objection whatever to joining the association, or that anything more than mere advice was used in the premises. Plainly, this offered proof would not have shown coercion. Besides, by the very terms of the contract he was at liberty to withdraw at the end of any month, and was at liberty, after he was injured, to refuse to accept the benefits and sue the company for damages. Some contention is also made that when appellant received the first payment of benefits, which was $2, he was under the influence of opiates, and, by reason thereof, unable to appreciate the full import and meaning of the reception of such benefits. In the first place, the evidence was insufficient to establish appellant's contention in this regard; and, in the second place, he continued to receive monthly instalments varying in the amounts from $29 to $31, for eight months thereafter, and it is not claimed that he did not at those times fully understand the consequences of his acts. Upon the whole record we are satisfied there was no evidence admitted or offered which would have authorized the jury to find a verdict against the company, and that the court properly directed a verdict in its favor.

The judgment of the Appellate Court affirming the judgment below is affirmed.

Magruder, J., dissenting:

It is not lawful for a railroad company to engage in the insurance business. A corporation can only exercise such powers as are expressly granted to it, or such implied powers as may be necessary to carry out or effectuate its express powers. A railroad company is authorized by its charter to carry freight and passengers. It is a common carrier, and nothing else. The insurance of its employees is not one of its implied powers. If it be true that a railroad company can insure its employees because they need insurance, then it can go into the tailoring or clothing business because its employees need clothes, or operate a farm to raise cattle and hogs and poultry and wheat and corn because its employees need food. Such an extension of the implied powers of a railroad company as is thus indicated would lead eventually to an absorption by the railroad companies of all the employments and all the business of the country. Monopolies, created by the gradual reaching out of railroads into the various departments of business in no way connected with the original purposes of their organization are dangerous to the liberties of the people.

KANSAS SUPREME COURT.

STATE of Kansas

v.

James McNASPY, Appt.

(.....Kan.....)

*1. A fugitive from the justice of this state, residing in another state, for whose arrest an officer has no other authority than a warrant issued by a justice of the peace of this state, and who is informed by such officer of his lack of authority, but who, at the officer's instigation, waives the necessity of requisition papers, and submits to arrest upon the justice's warrant, and is brought by the officer back to this state, will be held to have voluntarily come within the jurisdiction of the court, and may, immediately upon his arrival here, be prosecuted for another offense than the one described in the warrant, and to respond to which he agreed to return.

2. In prosecutions for forgery committed by the insertion in an instrument of additional words materially changing its terms, the information should set forth a copy of the instrument, so as to show the interpolated words and their materiality, or reasons for the failure to do so, other than mere lack of knowledge, should be stated in the information.

APPEAL by defendant from a judgment of the District Court for Dickinson County convicting him of forgery. Reversed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. Stambaugh & Hurd, for appellant:

The defendant was arrested in the state of Missouri by virtue of a warrant charging a different offense, and incarcerated in the jail of Dickinson county, Kansas, and there remained until the filing of the motion to quash.

The defendant's presence within the jurisdiction of the court was obtained by virtue of the complaint and warrant issued in another case against him, and he ought not to be prosecuted for the offense charged in this case until after the other case is disposed of and he is given an opportunity to return to Missouri, notwithstanding his attendance was obtained without a requisition.

The motion to quash should have been sustained for the reason that the information is indefinite, uncertain, and bad for duplicity.

State v. Goodwin, 38 Kan. 538.

The facts as stated in this information would not be sufficient, with the evidence introduced on the trial, even in a civil action, to entitle

Messrs. R. H. Kane and L. C. Boyle, Attorney General, for the State:

The defendant came voluntarily into the state of Kansas, and having come voluntarily he could invoke no right, privilege, or immunity from arrest for another criminal offense against the laws of the state of Kansas which might exist under the laws or the Constitution.

Lascelles v. Georgia, 148 U. S. 537, 37 L. ed. 550; Mahon v. Justice, 127 U. S. 700, 32 L. ed. 283; Ker v. Illinois, 119 U. S. 436, 30 L. ed. 421; Cook v. Hart, 146 U. S. 183, 36 L. ed. 934; State v. Stewart, 60 Wis. 587, 50 Am. Rep. 388; Williams v. Weber, 1 Colo. App. 191.

It was not necessary in this case for the prosecution to set out a copy of the written instrument, as it clearly appears in the evidence that the note alleged to have been forged was not at any time since the commission of the crime of forgery in the possession or under the control of the prosecuting witness or the prosecuting attorney.

1 Bishop, Crim. Proc. §§ 553, 559; Bishop, Directions & Forms, § 468; 2 Bishop, Crim. L. § 589.

The allegation in the information, "a more particular description of which said instrument of writing, to wit, said promissory note, cannot now be given for want of sufficient knowledge," cures all defects of description.

Doster, Ch. J., delivered the opinion of the court:

This is an appeal from a sentence of conviction. A complaint was filed by one Mina C. Hart with a justice of the peace of Dickinson county, charging the defendant with the forgery of a promissory note for $163, purporting to have been made by one James M. Harmon, with the intent to defraud one H. M. Budd. A warrant of arrest was issued upon this complaint, and placed in the hands of a deputy sheriff. This officer proceeded to Thayer, Missouri, where the defendant was, and procured the marshal of that city to arrest him. He then informed him that he had a warrant for his arrest, but that, having no requisition by the Kansas authorities upon those of Missouri, he had no right to take him into custody and bring him back to this state, but asked him whether he would come back without a requisition, and would sign a stipulation to that effect. The defendant said he would do so, whereupon he and the deputy sheriff went to the office of a notary public, where, together, they read the warrant over, and the defendant agreed in writing that he would return to Kansas with the officer, in pursuance of the authority of the warrant. He was then put in the custody of the marshal of Thayer, and confined in the city prison for several hours, until the arrival of a train for Kansas. He returned to Abilene in company with the deputy sheriff, and soon after his return another warrant for his arrest was issued and served upon him by the same officer. This warrant was based upon a complaint made by one Albert Wendlandt, charging the forgery of a promissory note purporting to be the note of said Wendlandt, by increasing it from $30 to $180, with intent to defraud said Wendlandt. This complaint and warrant constitute the basis of the present case. It does not appear that the deputy sheriff who went to Missouri for the defendant, or the city marshal there who arrested and confined him, used any coercive or deceptive measures to get him back into this state, or to induce him to consent to return. Since his first arrest he has been continuously in custody. Proper objections were made by the defendant to any proceedings upon the information filed against him, upon the ground that he had been fraudulently induced to return to the jurisdiction of this state to answer a different charge than that for which he was placed on trial. These objections were overruled. He was adjudged guilty, and from the sentence of conviction appeals to this court, upon the above-stated claim of error, and upon others presently to be noted.

A majority of the court are of the opinion that under the above-recited state of facts it must be adjudged that the defendant came voluntarily into the jurisdiction of the court, and that none of the principles upon which accused persons going or being carried from one state to another, to answer to charges of crime, are allowed immunity from prosecution upon other criminal charges, can be invoked by him. I am strongly of the opposite opinion for the reasons hereafter stated.

No copy of the note, either in its original or altered form, was set forth in the information, nor was any statement made of the substance of those parts in which the alteration of its amount occurred. The information, however, alleges that "a more particular description of which instrument of writing, to wit, said promissory note, cannot now be given, for want of sufficient knowledge," but no reason is given why knowledge could not be obtained. A motion to quash the information for failure to set forth the instrument so as to show wherein the forgery occurred was overruled. It should have been sustained. In cases of forgery, it is incumbent upon the prosecution to set out the forged instrument; but if such is not done, a sufficient reason for the omission should be given, as that it had been lost or destroyed, or is in the hands of the defendant, or is otherwise inaccessible. The authorities are agreed to this effect. 1 Whart. Crim. L. § 727 et seq.; Whart. Prec. of Ind. & Pl. § 264; 1 Bishop, Crim. Proc. § 553. In an indictment for forgery effected by interpolating words in a genuine instrument, as, in this case, by raising the amount of a note, the added words should be quoted, and the position given them in the instrument should be shown, so that it may appear how they affect its meaning. State v. Bryant, 17 N. H. 823. Other claims of error are made. We have examined all of them, and do not regard them as meritorious; but for the defect in the information the appeal is sustained, the sentence ordered vacated, and direction given to sustain the motion to quash the information.

Recurring now to the question first discussed, I feel that this defendant should be discharged from custody upon the ground that he was fraudulently induced to come within our jurisdiction to answer a charge which was withdrawn immediately upon his arrival, and for which the present accusation was at once substituted. Whether the authorities of Dickinson county, in any of the steps taken to secure the apprehension and trial of the defendant, were possessed of an actual fraudulent intent, or whether they acted without a realization of the turpitude of their conduct, is immaterial. Certain it is that what they did operated to deceive the defendant as to their purpose in bringing him from Missouri to this state, and was such conduct as they should have known would have the effect of deceiving him. They are therefore, in my judgment, precluded from disavowing a fraudulent intent. Representations were made to the defendant that he was accused by one Hart of the crime of forging a note upon one Harmon, with intent to defraud one Budd, and he was asked whether he would waive the formality of a requisition upon the governor of Missouri, would submit to arrest upon an ordinary warrant, and accompany the officer back to the scene of the alleged offense in Kansas. He consented to do so, presumably conscious of his ability to prove his innocence of that charge. No sooner was he fully within the jurisdiction of the court, than the state, as though it contemplated the ensnarement of the defendant in a trap, abandoned the charge to which he had been induced to respond, and preferred an entirely different one, made by one Wendlandt, for the forgery of a note upon said Wendlandt with intent to defraud him (the said Wendlandt). That was a fraud upon the defendant, and the court should not have permitted its process to be used to give it effect. It will not do to say that the officers violated no faith with the defendant because, as an inducement to return, they made no promise of immunity from arrest upon other charges. The making of the first charge was by reasonable implication a representation that it, and it alone, was the one upon which he was to be tried. There is not, I confidently believe, a single case, decided upon the principles of the extradition laws, or otherwise, in which a denial of the defendant's rights in this respect has been rested upon such narrow grounds. Nor will it do to say that the state is not bound by an implied agreement upon the part of the officers to prosecute upon the charge first made, and upon no others, resulting from their conduct in inducing him to agree to return to answer such charge alone. The state set in motion its legal machinery for the defendant's apprehension and trial, and it is bound by the action of its officers in securing jurisdiction of his person. It is inconsistent with the high faith and dignity of the sovereign to countenance the practice of subterfuge and artifice in its behalf, or to accept an advantage over one of its citizens secured by the trickery and chicanery of its official servants. Its grace and honor in this respect are legal obligations, enforceable by the courts. As remarked by Mr. Justice Valentine in State v. Hall, 40 Kan. 842: "The state should not be allowed to obtain jurisdiction of a fugitive from justice for one purpose, and then take advantage of that jurisdiction thus obtained and use it for another and a different purpose. A state has no more right to act fraudulently or unfairly than an individual person has, and what the state does by its officers or agents it does itself." In such cases the limitations of good faith and fair dealings which rest upon private individuals likewise rest upon the state. The state permits no fraudulent use of its process in controversies between its citizens, and it would be strange indeed if the sovereign should stoop to the performance of an act which it esteems dishonorable in them. Where a person by fraud and deceit inveigles another into the jurisdiction of the court for the purpose of suing him and of obtaining service of summons upon him in that jurisdiction, the summons and service thereof should be set aside. Such an abuse of judicial process cannot be tolerated in any court of justice. Van Horn v. Great Western Mfg. Co. 37 Kan. 523. I do not believe there is a single case dissenting from the above statement of law. The principle thus declared is the true basis for all the decisions affirming the right of extradited persons to be tried alone upon the charge first preferred. 'Good faith is the raison d'être of them all,—good faith not merely towards the sovereign surrendering the fugitive, but towards the fugitive as well. This was the controlling reason for the decision in State v. Hall, 40 Kan. 842, and State v. Simmons, 39 Kan. 262. In the former case it was remarked: "It is a general maxim of law that judicial process shall not be abused. But to try a person for an offense other than the one for which he was extradited would be an abuse of judicial process. Within this broad and general maxim above referred to is included the following more definite rule of law, to wit: Where the presence of a person has been changed from a place outside of the territorial jurisdiction of a court of justice to a place within such jurisdiction, and this change has been procured through the instrumentality of another person and upon a pretext of thereby accomplishing some particular purpose, such first-mentioned person cannot, after his presence has been thus obtained within the territorial jurisdiction of the court, and before he has had an opportunity to return, be prosecuted in such court by the person who has thus been instrumental in procuring his presence, for the purpose of accomplishing some wholly different purpose." In the latter case it was also remarked: "It would not be proper for any court in any state to sustain a service of any judicial process, either civil or criminal, where the service of such process was obtained only by the infraction of some law, or in violation of some well-recognized rule of honesty or fair dealing, as by force or fraud. Such a service would not only be a special wrong against the individual upon whom the service was made, but it would also be a general wrong against society itself—a violation of those fundamental principles of mutual trust and confidence which lie at the very foundation of all organized society, and which are necessary in the very nature of things, to hold society together." Counsel for the state in the case under consideration assumes that the authority of the Case of Hall, 40 Kan. 842, is now at an end, because overruled by the later decision of the Supreme Court of the United States in Lascelles v. Georgia, 148 U. S. 587, 37 L. ed. 549. There is, however, no conflict between them. Lascelles claimed immunity from prosecution upon charges other than the one for which extradited because of the protective provisions (as he viewed them) of the Federal Constitution and statutes. The court simply held against his theory of constitutional and statutory interpretation, and denied his claim of constitutional right. The subject of limitations upon the right of prosecution growing out of the principles of interstate comity, and of good faith and honest dealing with the defendant, was not adverted to, because not involved in the case. Whether, since the decision of Lascelles v. Georgia, a claim of immunity from additional prosecution can still be rested upon constitutional grounds, certain it is that the general grounds of justice are still open. Upon these grounds the decisions of State v. Hall, 40 Kan. 842, and State v. Simmons, 39 Kan. 262, were based, and, as I think, the one in this case should be based.

decree of the Chancery Court for Bradley County in plaintiff's favor in a suit brought to subject a scholarship owned by defendants to the payment of their debts. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. Mayfield & Son & Aiken for appellant.

Messrs. Vertrees & Vertrees and Webb & McClung for appellee William Morrow.

Wilkes, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

Centenary Female College is a chartered institution for the education of girls, located at Cleveland, Tennessee. Defendant Morrow, who was at the time a man of wealth and public spirit, donated and paid to it $5,000. About the same time, Mr. Hale agreed to give $5,000, but he became afterwards unable to do so. Thereupon defendant Morrow assumed and paid this amount, also. The authorities of the college, in grateful acknowledgment of the gift, bestowed upon each of the parties the right to appoint a pupil to attend the college and receive its benefits and advantages free of charge. This was done by resolution, with suitable laudatory preamble, and is in the following words: "Resolved, that the board hereby gives and grants to James W. Hale and Wm. Morrow each a scholarship perpetual in Centenary College, which shall give the right to place and keep in the college one pupil, who shall have all the advantages of the college (board, furnished room, fuel, lights, tuition in literary department, tuition in musical department, tuition in art department) free of charge." An addition to the college was erected, and named the "Hale and Morrow Wing," and a hearty indorsement of the use of the Bible as a text-book in the college was also expressed. A certified copy of the resolutions was sent to Hale and Morrow. Some years thereafter Dr. Morrow became involved in financial embarrassments, resulting in his insolvency. The complainant bank was one of his creditors, and in October, 1893, recovered a judgment against him for $8,000, upon which execution issued, and was returned nulla bona. It then filed its bill against Morrow, and sought to subject to sale for its debt the right or power to appoint to a scholarship vested in him by said proceedings and resolution. The bill proceeds upon the theory that Morrow had paid the entire $10,000, and was entitled to the two scholarships; that they were property rights, and subject to sale for his debts. An attachment issued, and the officer returned that he had levied it upon the scholarship in the hands of the college, and had notified the president of its board of trustees, and of the college faculty. Morrow answered the bill, admitted the judgment and his insolvency, but denied that he had shifted or concealed any of his property to evade his creditors. He set out fully the circumstances of the gift of $5,000, and the subsequent assumption and payment of the amount promised by Hale, of $5,000 and stated that the gifts were unconditional, and the subsequent act of the college in conferring upon him the power of appointment was voluntary, and that, in view of his payments of his own and Hale's gifts, he had been permitted to send two pupils to the college, and that he had exercised this privilege by appointing worthy daughters of poor ministers. After his answer was made, Hale was made a party by amended bill and publication, and it was alleged that all Hale's rights and privileges in the premises had become vested in Morrow, and hence both scholarships were subject to his debts. A pro confesso was taken against the college and against Hale, and a decree was rendered holding that the scholarships were vested rights in defendant Morrow, and that they had been rightfully attached, and they were ordered to be sold by the master. They were sold October 5, 1895; the bank buying one of the scholarships for $525, and one James M. Loudon the other for $500. The sale was reported, but has not been confirmed. A writ of error was granted to defendant Morrow to bring the case to the supreme court. The cause has been heard by the court of chancery appeals, and the decree of the court below reversed; and it is now before us on appeal of complainant, and errors assigned by it.

The question presented is whether this right of appointment vested in defendant Morrow is such property as can be taken for debt. It is argued that it is a valuable property right; that it is perpetual; that it is unlimited as to time, and unconditional; that it can be disposed of by will or deed, or other proper transfer; and that the courts can divest it out of him and vest it in another. The only question before us is whether it can be seized for debt and sold at public sale. As to whether it can be revoked by the college authorities, we are not called upon to decide. Neither are we called upon to say whether Morrow may devise or give it to another. None of these questions are involved in this case, except very remotely and incidentally. We have not been furnished with any authority upon this novel question. It will be noted that it was not a case of an ordinary scholarship sold by an institution to a purchaser, with right to use or sell and transfer it as he might choose, as is often done by schools. Nor is it a power over or attached to real estate or tangible property. It is not, in any correct sense of the term, an "estate." It is merely a privilege or power to be exercised by and with consent of the college, and under its rules and regulations. Certainly the power cannot be exercised, and appointment made, except under such reasonable rules and requirements as the college might dictate. It must be subject to the charter and regulations which control the institution. Dr. Morrow, subject to these limitations, can appoint whom he pleases. He can decline to appoint altogether. It is a privilege personal to him as long, at least, as he sees proper to exercise or refuse to exercise it. It does not appear that he has attempted to use it for any pecuniary or personal benefit. The appointment had been treated as an act of charity. If it can be sold publicly, any person might buy, and the power of appointment might thus be vested in disreputable hands. We do not think it is such a right as can be seized and sold for debt.

Let the decree of the Court of Chancery Appeals be affirmed.

NORTH DAKOTA SUPREME COURT.

Lynn C. STANFORD, Respt.,

v.

S. G. MAGILL et al., Appls.

(.....N. D.)

- *1. The repudiation of a contract before the time for performance arrives does not constitute a breach thereof. The only effect of such repudiation is to dispense with an offer to perform by the other party if such refusal to stand by the agreement is not withdrawn before the performance is due under the terms thereof.
2. The vendor in a contract to sell property of a certain description, no particular articles being agreed upon, can, after he has made, before the day of delivery, an ex parte selection of the property he intends to deliver under such contract, sell such property to another, without being guilty of a breach of agreement. All that the law requires of him is that he make delivery of property of the description mentioned in the contract at the time delivery is due.
3. Whether the sale, by the vendor in an executory contract for the sale of specific property, of the very property to which such contract relates, before the day for delivery thereunder has arrived, is a breach of the agreement, on the ground that the vendor has thereby put it out of his power to perform the agreement, not decided. But the mere making of a second executory contract to sell the same property is not of itself a breach of the prior executory contract. The vendor does not thereby incapacitate himself from carrying out his contract.
4. Where a party has an option to deliver property under a contract at any time between certain dates, he must, if he intends to treat the time of performance as having arrived, and therefore to hold a repudiation of the agreement by the vendee before the last day for performance has arrived as a breach thereof, notify the vendee that he has exercised his option to call for an earlier delivery. But no offer to perform is necessary, as that is waived by the vendee's refusal to perform.
5. The measure of damages in an action by a vendor to recover damages for breach by a vendee of an executory contract of purchase and sale is fixed by §§ 4988, 5009, Rev. Codes, where the vendor does not elect to proceed under § 4983, Id.
6. Where a suitor moves the court to direct a verdict in his favor, and his motion is overruled, he must thereafter specifically request that the questions he desires to have submitted to the jury be so submitted, or he is deemed to have agreed that all controverted questions of fact be decided by the court. If he makes no such request, he cannot complain of a direct verdict if the evidence is conflicting. But the rule will not apply if the verdict would be held to be unsupported by evidence, although voluntarily tendered by the jury.
7. It is only when property has been resold by the vendor in the manner prescribed by § 4983 that he can recover the damages mentioned in subdiv. 1 of § 4988; and, if it is not so sold, the measure of damages is governed by subdiv. 2 of § 4988 and § 5009. An abortive attempt to proceed under § 4983 will not preclude a recovery of damages under subdiv. 2 of § 4988 and § 5009.

APPEAL by defendants from a judgment of the District Court for Cass County in favor of plaintiff in an action brought to recover damages for breach of a contract to purchase flax. Reversed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. Ball, Watson, & MacLay, for appellants:

One who sells or agrees to sell personal property as his own thereby warrants that he has a good and unencumbered title thereto. Rev. Codes, § 3972.

Plaintiff had no such title, but such fact was not communicated to defendants and they dealt in ignorance of it. This amounted to a failure of title, a failure of consideration, and went to the substance of the contract.

Plaintiff was unable at any time in September to deliver the flax on board the cars.

Plaintiff by his conduct on September 9 elected to rescind the sale.

Plaintiff elected to rescind the contract by selling the flax at private sale and without notice to defendants.

None of the provisions of the statutes were complied with for establishing the measure of damages.

There should be notice to the vendee, in case the vendor elects to hold a lien for the purchase price.

Sands v. Taylor, 5 Johns. 395, 4 Am. Dec. 874; Mallory v. Lord, 29 Barb. 454.

The common-law remedy of storing and retaining the property for the vendee and suing him for the entire purchase price does not seem to be included in any of the provisions of our Code.

See Dustan v. McAndrew, 44 N. Y. 78.

At common law it was always necessary for the vendor to give notice of his intention to resell.

2 Sutherland, Damages, p. 859, and cases cited; 21 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law, 595, 800; Pollen v. LeRoy, 80 N. Y. 549; Rea v. Holland (Mich.) 12 N. W. 169.

The plaintiff, when he resold at private sale, rescinded the contract as he had a right to do under § 3963. He elected to rescind in preference to either keeping the property and holding defendants for the difference in value, or treating the property as a pledge, and reselling according to the statute.

The remedies are not concurrent. The choice once made, the others are gone forever.

Respondent elected to hold the appellants to their contract, and proceeded to fix the damages under the rule laid down by § 4988, subd. 2, as explained by § 5009.

Corliss, Ch. J., delivered the opinion of the court:

On the 8d of August, 1895, plaintiff and defendants entered into an executory contract for the sale by plaintiff to defendants of 5,000 bushels of No. 1 flax, at $1 a bushel, to be delivered at Kelson, in Traill county, in this state, during the month of September of that year. On the 7th of September following the defendants notified the plaintiff by letter that they did not recognize the binding force of the agreement, and therefore refused to carry it out on their part. This letter was received by him September 8. At that time the plaintiff had not exercised his option to make delivery at any time during that month, as was his right under the contract. The action was to recover damages for breach of this agreement, and on the trial of the case the court directed a verdict for the plaintiff. The defendants on this appeal urge certain reasons why they should not be held liable. They insist that the crop of flax raised by plaintiff on his farm was mortgaged, and that, therefore, he could not give them an unencumbered title. But whether he could deliver the flax, according to his contract, free from all liens, could not be determined in advance of the actual delivery thereof. In the meantime the mortgage might be paid, or the mortgagee might release the 5,000 bushels from the lien of his mortgage. Had the plaintiff tendered the defendants 5,000 bushels with a lien thereon, they would have been justified in refusing to receive the same; and had he not, in proper time, delivered to them the flax free from all encumbrances, they could have held him responsible for breach of contract. But they had no right to settle for the plaintiff, in advance of the time when he was required by the terms of the contract to make delivery, the question whether he could and would deliver unencumbered flax. Moreover, the specific property to be delivered was not designated in the contract. It was not necessary that the plaintiff should deliver any of the flax raised upon his own farm. Delivery of any 5,000 bushels of flax, of the quality and grade specified in the agreement, would have constituted compliance with the contract on the part of the plaintiff. It is further urged that plaintiff was not able to deliver the flax for the reason that up to the end of the month of September he had threshed only 642 bushels. If it should be conceded that plaintiff had not, and could not have, threshed a bushel during the month of September, this would not establish any inability on his part to comply with the terms of his agreement. A person may agree to sell property which he does not even own, and the purchaser cannot on that account insist, as an excuse for violating his agreement, that it is not in the power of the vendor to make good his promise. This fact cannot be ascertained until the day for delivery has come and passed without any delivery being made. It is claimed that plaintiff rescinded the contract by selling the 5,000 bushels in Duluth on the 9th of September, two days after the defendants had written plaintiff that they would not fulfil their agreement. The question whether the contract was rescinded is so related to the question whether it was violated by the defendants, and the further question when it was broken by them, if at all, that it will conduce to clearness of discussion to treat these questions together.

On receiving from defendants their letter of the 7th of September, repudiating the contract, the plaintiff wrote them that he expected them to carry out the agreement, and that he would give them further time for consideration. In this letter, which was written September 9, he says, among other things: "Altogether, I am inclined to defer my conclusions until you have taken time to review the transaction, and see the unfavorable light your letter of the 7th puts you in. I certainly shall expect you to take flax as per agreement. Please let me hear from you again by return mail." On the same day he sold on the Board of Trade in Duluth 5,000 bushels of flax, through brokers in that city. In his testimony he speaks of this flax as being the same flax which he had agreed to sell to defendants. He says: "When I received this letter [referring to the one dated September 7], I sold the 5,000 bushels of flax in Duluth. I sold it to Wheeler, Carter, & Co. On September 9 I telegraphed Wheeler, Carter, & Co., of Duluth, relative to the sale of this 5,000 bushels of flax, as follows: 'Sell five October flax. Answer.' Wheeler, Carter, & Co. answered by wire that they had sold the flax; and the same day they confirmed their telegram by a letter, in which they explained in detail the circumstances and terms of the sale. But it is undisputed that the title to the flax sold in Duluth did not pass to the vendees in such sale, nor was possession thereof delivered at any time during the month of September. The contract was merely an executory contract for the sale of 5,000 bushels of flax, to be delivered in October. On the 11th of September the plaintiff, not having received from the defendants any answer to his letter of the 9th, again wrote them; and on the 13th they sent him a reply, in which they reiterated their purpose to treat the alleged contract as possessing no binding force. In this letter they said, "We expressly deny that any contract exists which obligates you to deliver to us, or we to receive from you, flax, at any time, or at any price." This closed the correspondence between the parties. The plaintiff did not thereafter inform the defendants that he elected to treat their second refusal to recognize the contract as a breach thereof; nor did he advise them, after their last refusal, that he had decided to exercise his option to insist upon the fulfilment of the agreement before September 30th. The contract gave him the option to call for performance at any time during the month of September. This action was not commenced until after the 30th of that month.

We will first consider the case as though there was a fixed time for performance of the agreement, and that that time was September 30. Under the English doctrine, which has apparently met with much favor in this country, the plaintiff, even assuming that the day for delivery of the flax was September 30, and that he had no right to call for an earlier performance of the agreement, might have elected to treat the defendants' premature refusal to carry out the contract as an immediate breach thereof. Hochster v. De La Tour, 2 El. & Bl. 678. But he did not so elect. On the contrary, he wrote the defendants that he would give them time to reflect and then determine what they would do, but that in any event, no matter what their decision might be, he would hold them to the contract. His words were, "I shall expect you to take flax as per agreement." Although the English courts have, in our judgment, departed from sound principles, in holding that mere talk is a breach of a contract, despite the fact that the time for performance thereof has not arrived, yet they have not violated justice as well as legal principles by putting it in the power of the party to an agreement, who does not wish to fulfil it, to force a breach upon the other party before the day for performance has arrived, and thus escape the perhaps more serious consequences which might flow from a breach at the time of performance, by selecting such a season for a premature breach thereof as would make the damages comparatively light. In England the innocent party may treat a premature refusal to perform as a present breach, but he is not bound to do so. If he elects to ignore such refusal, the agreement, so far as the question of the violation of it is concerned, stands precisely the same as though no word had been uttered by the other party. If anything occurs which would have released that party from the obligation of the agreement had he remained silent, he is released notwithstanding his premature repudiation thereof. It follows, too, that if then the innocent party thereafter violates the contract the other party may take advantage of such violation of the agreement, just as he could have taken advantage of it had he not himself prematurely refused to respect the binding force of such agreement. 88 L. R. A.

All the adjudications which follow what may, for convenience, be denominated the "English doctrine," indorse this qualification of that doctrine, and it is repeatedly recognized by the English tribunals themselves. Frost v. Knight, L. R. 7 Exch. 111; John A. Roebling's Sons' Co. v. Lock-Stitch Fence Co. 180 Ill. 660; Kadiash v. Young, 108 Ill. 170; Lawson, Contr. § 440; Zuck v. McClure, 98 Pa. 541; Avery v. Bowden, 5 El. & Bl. 714; Reid v. Hoskins, 5 El. & Bl. 729.

In Frost v. Knight, Lord Chief Justice Cockburn said: "The law with reference to a contract to be performed at a future time, where the party bound to perform announces prior to the time his intention not to perform it, as established by the cases of Hochster v. De La Tour and Danube & B. S. R. & K. Harbour Co. v. Xenos, 13 C. B. N. S. 825, on the one hand, and Avery v. Bowden, Reid v. Hoskins, and Barwick v. Buba [2 C. B. N. S. 568, 26 L. J. C. P. N. S. 280], on the other, may be thus stated. The promisee, if he pleases, may treat the notice of intention as inoperative, and await the time when the contract is to be executed, and then hold the other party responsible for all the consequences of nonperformance. But in that case he keeps the contract alive for the benefit of the other party as well as his own; he remains subject to all his own obligations and liabilities under it, and enables the other party not only to complete the contract, if so advised, notwithstanding his previous repudiation of it, but also to take advantage of any circumstance which would justify him in declining to complete it." We are therefore clear that, if plaintiff's letter of September 9 is to control, the contract was not broken September 7. The plaintiff in and by that letter elected to treat the contract as unaffected by the letter of September 7 written him by the defendants. But it may be urged that other circumstances show that the plaintiff had elected on September 9 to treat the contract as broken by the defendants by their first letter, dated September 7. In his complaint the plaintiff alleges that he made the sale of the 5,000 bushels of flax in Duluth for the purpose of fixing at that time the amount of defendants' liability for damages, the price of the flax being at that time daily on the decline. The averment of the pleading on this point is as follows: "That immediately after the defendants had so repudiated the said agreement, and refused to accept the delivery of the said flax, and refused to pay for the same, as provided by and in the said agreement, and on or about the 7th day of September, A. D. 1895, the plaintiff, in order to protect the defendants against loss, as much as possible, in view of the facts and circumstances incident to the said agreement and the said breach thereof, the market price of flax being then daily on the decline, sold the said 5,000 bushels of flax at the best market price obtainable, and which he could obtain for the same." Taking plaintiff's allegation in connection with this testimony, there is much to show that he had elected to proceed on the theory of a breach of the contract on September 7, the day when the defendants wrote their first repudiation of the agreement. But the sale of the 5,000 bushels of flax in Duluth on September 9 does not purport to be a sale of the particular flax which plaintiff had contracted to sell the defendants, nor is there anything to indicate that plaintiff's purpose in selling it was to fix the defendants' damages, on the theory of a then breach of the contract, aside from his allegation in the complaint. He never at any time disclosed to the defendants any such purpose, nor did he ever advise them at all that he had sold their flax. On the contrary, he distinctly informed them in his letter of September 9 that he did not consider their letter of September 7 as a breach of the agreement, but that he certainly would expect them to take the flax according to the contract. His election to ignore their premature refusal, and to treat the agreement as unaffected by anything they had said, is conclusively shown by his letter of September 9; and thereafter the defendants might have recalled their refusal, and have proceeded with the performance of the agreement, despite anything the plaintiff might in the meantime have done. His undisclosed sale of the flax in Duluth could in no manner affect their right to hold him to his avowed purpose to regard the agreement as continuing in unimpaired force. Moreover, we should reach no different conclusions even if we should find that plaintiff had not in express terms asserted that he would not treat the contract as broken. We are confident in the soundness of our view that the English doctrine, that a refusal to perform a contract before the period of performance by either party has arrived constitutes a breach thereof, is violative of legal principles, and leads to most incongruous results. This point, however, we will discuss in a later portion of the opinion.

But it is strenuously urged that plaintiff cannot recover, because he has rescinded the contract, and also because he had himself broken it, while it remained unbroken by the defendants. The sale in Duluth is relied upon as establishing the rescission by him of the agreement. We are concerned in this case with only the question of rescission based on mutual consent. It is not a case where one party has the right to rescind an agreement for the fraud of the other, or for other legal reasons of like character. When one party to an agreement has violated its obligations in a particular that goes to the root of the agreement, then it is true that the other party may treat his conduct as an offer to rescind, and may acquiesce in the desire so manifested to abandon the contract. In such a case the parties unite in a mutual release of the obligations which reciprocally bind them. So, too, when one party to an agreement expresses, even before the time for performance has arrived, his desire to escape the burdens of the agreement, he thereby offers to discharge the other party from the obligations thereunder resting upon him; and such party may treat such conduct as an overture for rescission, and assent thereto. Doubtless, the plaintiff, after receiving from the defendants their letter of September 7, might have written them that he considered the contract as canceled, and thereafter it would have been forever extinguished for all purposes. Possibly he might have rescinded without performing any overt act, or making any statement to manifest his purpose. But that he never intended to rescind the agreement is too clear to admit of doubt. His letter of September 9 shows that he had no thought of rescinding, and thereby releasing defendants from liability. So do the allegations of his complaint. Although his letter is inconsistent with the averments of his pleading that he sold the flax on a theory of a present breach of the contract, yet it is to be noticed that nowhere does he assent to a rescission thereof. His attitude is at all times that he will rigidly hold the defendants to the obligations of their agreement. In his letter he tells them that he will hold them to it, by his statement that he will insist upon performance on their part. In his pleading he alleges that he intended to hold them to it when he sold the flax in Duluth, for he sold it with the express purpose of fixing their damages for a breach thereof. However much he may have been mistaken as to his legal right to sell at that time, and in the manner in which the sale was made, for the purpose of fixing the measure of damages, he clearly never meant to acquiesce in the repudiation of the contract by the defendants, and thus assent to a rescission thereof. But if, while the agreement remained in full force, the plaintiff himself violated its terms, then it is obvious that the defendants may take advantage of this breach as a perfect defense. They may elect to treat his breach of contract as warranting a rescission thereof by them, or they may consider it as a breach, rendering him liable for damages. In either event they would have a perfect defense to this action. It is therefore necessary to determine whether, by the sale of the flax in Duluth on the 9th of September, the plaintiff himself violated his agreement to deliver the flax to the defendants. It is not pretended that he violated it in any other manner. The plaintiff did not agree to deliver any particular 5,000 bushels of flax to the defendants. All that he was called upon to do, to fulfil his obligation, was to deliver the specified number of bushels of flax, of the quality and grade designated in the contract, without reference to the place where it was raised, or the question whether it was owned by the plaintiff at the time the agreement was entered into.

But it is said that it appears from the plaintiff's testimony that he segregated 5,000 bushels of flax from the common mass of the flax raised by him on his farm, and then sold that particular flax in Duluth, as being the identical property he had agreed to sell the defendants. It is true that he speaks of selling the same flax that he had agreed to deliver to the defendants, and the allegations of his complaint are to the same effect. But it is evident that the segregation of this flax was purely mental. He did not in fact set apart any particular 5,000 bushels as the property he had obligated himself to deliver to the defendants, and then agree to sell the same property in Duluth. At that time none of his flax had even been threshed. But even if we should assume that plaintiff had actually set apart a particular 5,000 bushels as the flax he was subsequently to deliver, and that thereafter he had sold and delivered it to a third person, this would not of itself constitute a breach of his contract. The selection by the vendor of the property he intends ultimately to deliver under a contract is not irrevocable, where he has the choice, and the vendee does not unite with him in such selection. Despite the fact that the vendor has set apart the property as the particular property he will finally deliver, he may change his mind before the time for delivery arrives, and substitute other property in place of that which he had tentatively selected. The vendee acquires by such an ex parte selection no vested right to insist that that is the particular property which must be delivered to him by the vendor to fulfil the conditions of the contract. All he can demand is that, when the time for performance arrives, property of the description and quality specified in the agreement shall be delivered to him. The implied understanding of the parties is that the vendor shall have until the day for performance to determine what specific property he will deliver. Any selection made by him before that time is revocable by him. The rights of the vendee are in no manner affected by such selection, or by the vendor's change of mind. He has no cause for complaint, provided, at the time prescribed in the agreement, property of the kind and quality of the property therein specified is delivered to him in strict accordance with the provisions thereof, whatever vacillations of purpose may have characterized the conduct of the vendor in the meantime. Should a grocer, receiving from a customer an order for a barrel of flour of a particular brand, to be delivered the following day, select, in the absence of such customer, a barrel from a number of barrels in stock, and direct that that barrel be taken to the customer's house the next day, it certainly would not be a breach of the contract for him subsequently to sell it and substitute another barrel in its place; the sale and substitution both taking place before the time for delivery according to the agreement had arrived. Indeed, it is questionable whether a sale and delivery of property by the vendor before the day for delivery under an executory contract has been reached is a breach of such contract, even in cases where the specific thing to which the contract relates is agreed upon by the parties. If A agrees to sell and deliver to B, at the end of thirty days, a particular horse, for a price named in the contract, can it be said that A has put it out of his power to perform the agreement by selling and delivering to C the same animal twenty days before B can call for the performance of the contract by A? How can B say, without possibility of error, that A will not be able to perform his agreement when the time for performance arrives? May not A repurchase the horse in time to fulfil his compact with B? See opinion of Denman, Ch. J., in Lovelock v. Franklin, 8 Q. B. 371; 2 Parsons, Contr. 668, 667. But see Heard v. Bowers, 23 Pick. 460.

Besides, on what principle can be based the doctrine that the certainty that a party will not be able to perform his agreement when performance by him is due is equivalent to a present breach of the contract, although, as a matter of fact, he has not violated, and cannot violate, the contract until the future day for fulfilment has been reached? It is by no means certain that the fact that a party has put it out of his power to perform a contract when the day of performance has arrived is a breach thereof, or whether the utmost effect of such an act is merely to make inevitable a future breach of the agreement. Neither can it be said in every case that the bare fact that the vendor in an executory contract of sale has, before performance is due, sold the very property to which the executory contract relates, demonstrates the certain inability of the vendor thereafter to make delivery in the future in accordance with the terms of his promise.

But in the case at bar it does not even appear that the plaintiff had sold the flax he had agreed to sell to the defendants. The second contract, like the first, was executory. It was an agreement which by its very terms was not to be performed until after the time for performance of the contract with the defendants had passed. The Duluth contract provided for delivery in October. It is therefore clear that plaintiff had not divested himself of the title to the flax, or agreed to deliver possession thereof to the Duluth parties at any time prior to the time for delivery to defendants under his contract with them. And it is an undisputed fact that he did not deliver any of such flax to the Duluth parties until long after the day for delivery to the defendants had passed. Indeed, all the flax called for by the Duluth contract had not been delivered at the time this case was tried. It is therefore apparent that, during the entire period between the making of the contract with the defendants and the time for performance thereof according to its terms, the plaintiff had not parted with the title to or possession of the 5,000 bushels of flax, even assuming that the contract with defendants related to a particular 5,000 bushels. Conceding that the two contracts both related to the same property, yet it is obvious that it cannot be said that the mere fact that plaintiff could not fulfil his agreement with defendants without being guilty of a breach of contract with the Duluth parties establishes the proposition that he had placed it beyond his power to carry out his agreement with the defendants. He was absolutely master of the situation. He could break either contract he saw fit to break, and perform either contract he saw fit to perform,—subject, of course, to legal liability for such breach. But it was not even necessary for him to violate his agreement with the defendants in order to fulfil his contract with the Duluth parties, even assuming that he had agreed to sell a particular 5,000 bushels to the defendants, and had in mind the same flax when he made the Duluth contract. In that contract he did not bind himself to deliver any particular 5,000 bushels of flax, but, on the contrary, to deliver any 5,000 bushels, of a certain grade, which he might tender in fulfilment of the contract. He may have considered that he was selling the 5,000 bushels he had agreed to sell the defendants, and yet he did not bind himself to sell only this flax to the parties in Duluth. At no time, therefore, did he divest himself of the title to the particular flax he had agreed to sell to defendants, assuming the specific flax to have been pointed out, or the possession thereof, or bind himself to sell it at all to the parties in Duluth.

When plaintiff wrote to defendants, on September 9, stating that he would give them further time to consider their refusal to recognize the contract, his attitude was that he did not elect to treat their first letter, to which his letter was in answer, as constituting a breach of the contract. But he did not thereby bind himself not to consider any subsequent repudiation by them of the agreement as a violation thereof. Accordingly we would be compelled to hold that, on receipt of their second letter, plaintiff was in a position to insist that defendants had broken the contract, if we should adopt the English rule. As before indicated, we deem it indefensible on principle, nor are we able to discover how it subverts business convenience, or in what respect it is more just than the contrary doctrine. In the country in which it had its origin, it was not at first recognized as the correct rule of law. In Phillipotts v. Eeans, 5 Mees. & W. 475, Parke, B., said: "The notice [that he will not receive the wheat] amounts to nothing until the time when the buyer ought to receive the goods, unless the seller acts on it in the meantime, and rescinds the contract. . . . I think no action would then have lain for the breach of the contract, but that the plaintiffs were bound to wait until the time arrived for the delivery of the wheat, to see whether the defendants would then receive it." In Leigh v. Paterson, 8 Taunt. 540, the defendant had until December 31 in which to deliver the goods contracted for. On October 1 he notified plaintiff that he would not carry out his contract. The question was whether the market value of the goods on October 1 or December 31 should be taken into consideration in fixing the plaintiff's damages. The court ruled that the value on December 31 was the value to be ascertained in determining the damages, and the decision was placed on the ground that, despite the premature repudiation of the contract by the defendant, he might thereafter have delivered the property, at any time up to December 31. Dallas, Ch. J., said: "The defendant had a right to deliver the tallow at any time before twelve at night on the 31st of December." Parke, J., said: "The defendant might have delivered the tallow any moment up to the 31st of December, and the price on that day should have regulated the verdict of the jury." In Ripley v. M'Clure, 4 Exch. 359, the court said, in reference to the contention of counsel for defendants, that the refusal on the part of the defendants to accept the goods, the refusal being made before the time for performance had arrived, was no more than an expression of intention, which could be retracted: "And we think, that, if the jury had been told that a refusal before the arrival of the cargo was a breach, that would have been incorrect. We consider that point rightly decided in Phillipotts v. Eeans, 5 Mees. & W. 475." Mr. Benjamin, in his work on Sales, declares that "the date at which the contract is considered to have been broken is that at which the goods were to have been delivered, not that at which the buyer may give notice that he intends to break the contract and so refuse accepting the goods." Vol. 2 § 1118. In the very case in which the modern English doctrine was first promulgated (Hochster v.

De La Tour, 2 El. & Bl. 678), Lord Campbell clearly recognizes the general rule that until the time for performance has arrived there can be no breach, by the assertion that it is not the universal rule, and by proceeding to carry out the exceptions to it. He seems to have treated the case before him as an exception to the general rule. And in Frost v. Knight, L. R. 7 Exch. 111, 114, Lord Chief Justice Cockburn declares, in so many words, "that there can be no actual breach of a contract by reason of nonperformance so long as the time for performance has not yet arrived." In Roper v. Johnson, L. R. 8 C. P. 167, the doctrine laid down in Hochster v. De La Tour is spoken of as a novel doctrine. While the court in Frost v. Knight, L. R. 7 Exch. 111, treats the rule enunciated in Hochster v. De La Tour as settled law, yet when Frost v. Knight was before the court of exchequer the majority of that court (Kelly, C. B., and Channell, B.) vigorously assailed the anomalous doctrine which was applied in the Hochster Case. See L. R. 5 Exch. 322. It is so obvious that, unless some obligation is violated by a party, he cannot be said to have broken his contract, that Lord Chief Justice Cockburn, in Frost v. Knight, was obliged to assume, in order to support his reasoning in that case, that there was an implied understanding that neither party should sever the contractual relation, and that the premature refusal to perform was a violation of this implied understanding. The lord chief justice says: "The promisee has an inchoate right to the performance of the bargain, which becomes complete when the time for performance has arrived. In the meantime he has a right to have the contract kept open as a subsisting and effective contract. Its unimpaired and unimpeached efficacy may be essential to his interests. His rights acquired under it may be dealt with by him in various ways for his benefit and advantage. Of all such advantage the repudiation of the contract by the other party, and the announcement that it never will be fulfilled, must of course deprive him. It is therefore quite right to hold that such announcement amounts to a violation of the contract in omnibus, and that upon it the promisee, if so minded, may at once treat it as a breach of the entire contract, and bring his action accordingly." But that is a strange mode of reasoning which assumes a breach for the purpose of establishing a breach. Lord Cockburn asserted that the contractual tie was severed, for the purpose of proving that the contract had been violated. Unless the contract calls for a continuance of the willingness of a party to perform it during all the time between the execution thereof and the day of performance, his mere expression of a purpose not to fulfil his obligation is not a breach of such contract. But what interest has a vendor in a contract for the sale of 5,000 bushels of flax in the unchanged purpose of the vendee to carry out the agreement? The only matter which concerns him is the willingness of the vendee at the time specified in the contract to accept and pay for the property. There is always the possibility that either party to an agreement may violate it when performance by him is due. This possibility is not converted into a certainty by his premature refusal to fulfil his obligations. He may repent of his hasty decision. After such anticipatory disavowal of the contract, there still remains, as before, the possibility both of ultimate performance and of ultimate violation of the agreement by the one who has threatened, but only threatened, to ignore it. By a premature repudiation the rights of the other party are not in any degree affected. He still has a right to insist upon the performance of the agreement at the appointed time, or that the other party shall pay damages for the breach of the contract. This was the extent of his right before the other party had spoken a word inimical to the agreement, and he continues to enjoy this right despite such premature repudiation.

How it can be asserted, as Lord Chief Justice Cockburn asserted in Frost v. Knight, that the premature repudiation of a contract deprives the other party of all advantage under it, is inexplicable. He, in the very same opinion, declared that the innocent party, so far from being deprived of any advantage, could elect to treat the agreement as unimpaired. The warning, which leaves the agreement unaffected, is a positive benefit, and not a detriment, to the other party. Should the would-be violator of the agreement keep his purpose to himself, the other party would be in a situation not so favorable. Suppose, for instance, that the vendor had agreed to sell property, fluctuating in value, at a specified time. He may discover, subsequently to the making of such contract, that the vendee has become insolvent and does not intend to perform the agreement; yet so long as such vendee keeps silent the vendor is obliged to stand to the agreement, taking all the risk that, if the market should turn against him at the time for delivery, he must lose, and yet knowing that, if the market should prove favorable to him, the vendee will break the contract, and leave him (the vendor) only a worthless cause of action for damages against a bankrupt. Under such circumstances a statement by the vendee that he will not carry out the contract would place the vendor in a more favorable position, for it would enable him, at his option, to rescind the contract, thus escaping the risk of loss in a case where he could not hope to reap any benefit from the agreement should the market be favorable to him at the time for performance. The fundamental inquiry is, of course, in every case, whether any essential provision of the contract, either express or implied, has been violated. If the agreement is for the sale of property at a fixed time in the future, the intermediate expression by either party of a purpose not to stand by the contract is not a breach thereof, because he has not thereby done anything in violation of his promise, to the detriment of the other party. But, if the contract is to marry at a future date, a different case is presented. The agreement to marry connotes the further agreement to remain affianced until the performance of the contract has established the still closer relation of husband and wife. Such an agreement establishes a distinctive relation, known as "betrothment." He who destroys this relation—though it be done before the period of marriage has, under the terms of the contract, arrived—violates the contract in a vital element; and the violation is none the less actionable because the promise to remain engaged in the meantime is implied, and not expressed. The contract is an entirety, and, when broken, is broken in its entirety. It is on this ground that the decision in Frost v. Knight, L. R. 7 Exch. 111, 114, is placed by the lord chief justice. He says: "It is next to be observed, that the law, as settled by Hochster v. De La Tour and Danube & B. S. R. & K. Harbour Co. v. Xenos, is obviously quite as applicable to a contract in which personal status or personal rights are involved, as to the one relating to commercial or pecuniary interests. Indeed, the contract of marriage appears to afford a striking illustration of the expediency of holding that an action may be maintained on the repudiation of a contract to be performed in futuro. On such a contract being entered into, not only does a right to its completion arise with reference to domestic relations and possibly pecuniary advantages, as also to the social status accruing on marriage, but a new status, that of betrothment, at once arises between the parties. This relation, it is true, has not, by the law of England, the same important consequences which attached to it by the canon law and the law of many other countries. Nevertheless, it carries with it consequences of the utmost importance to the parties. Each becomes bound to the other; neither can, consistently with such a relation, enter into a similar engagement with another person; each has an implied right to have this relation continued till the contract is finally accomplished by marriage." And Byles, J., concurs in the judgment of the court on the ground that the implied agreement to remain betrothed until marriage had been violated. He says: "An express pre-contract of marriage, as already suggested by the lord chief justice, places the man and woman in the condition or status of betrothment. In this state there are certain mutual duties. The woman, for example, may not, without a breach, marry another man, although it is possible that he may die before the future day appointed for the first intended marriage, whether already fixed, or whether contingent on a future event. So I conceive the man cannot during the stipulated period of betrothment, without a breach of contract, marry another woman, though she may die in the meantime. So, for one of the parties to break off the mutual engagement by an express refusal to perform it, though before the day, seems to me to be equally a breach of the contract, for it puts an end to the condition of betrothment, which, according to the contract, was to continue. In each of these three cases there is a repudiation of the duties springing from the new relation involved in the contract."

A review of the English decisions will disclose the fact that only in a single case has this modern English doctrine been applied where the enforcement of a contrary rule would have led to a different decision. This is Hochster v. De La Tour (decided in 1853) 2 El. & Bl. 678. In that case it appeared that the plaintiff and defendant, in April, 1852, had entered into a contract of service. The plaintiff was to serve the defendant, as a courier in his travels on the continent for a period of three months, commencing June 1, 1852. On the 11th day of May, 1852, defendant notified plaintiff that he would not perform the agreement, and on the 22d of the same year the action to recover damages for breach of the contract was commenced. The question was squarely raised, by the contention of counsel for the defense, whether what had been said by the defendant constituted a present breach of the agreement. The court of Queen's bench held that it did. Lord Campbell says: "The defendant's counsel very powerfully contended that, if the plaintiff was not contented to dissolve the contract, and to abandon all remedy upon it, he was bound to remain ready and willing to perform it till the day when the actual employment as courier in the service of the defendant was to begin; and that there could be no breach of the agreement, before that day, to give a right of action. But it cannot be laid down as a universal rule that, where by agreement an act is to be done on a future day, no action can be brought for a breach of the agreement till the day for doing the act has arrived. If a man promises to marry a woman on a future day, and before that day marries another woman, he is instantly liable for an action for breach of promise of marriage. Short v. Stone, 8 Q. B. 358. If a man contracts to execute a lease on and from a future day for a certain term, and before that day, executes a lease to another for the same term, he may be immediately sued for breaking the contract; Ford v. Tiley, 6 Barn. & C. 325. So, if a man contracts to sell and deliver specific goods on a future day, and before the day he sells and delivers them to another, he is immediately liable to an action at the suit of the person with whom he first contracted to sell and deliver them. Bowdell v. Parsons, 10 East, 859. One reason alleged in support of such an action is, that the defendant has, before the day, rendered it impossible for him to perform the contract at the day; but this does not necessarily follow, for, prior to the day fixed for doing the act, the first wife may have died, a surrender of the lease executed might be obtained, and the defendant might have repurchased the goods so as to be in a situation to sell and deliver them to the plaintiff. Another reason may be, that, where there is a contract to do an act on a future day, there is a relation constituted between the parties in the meantime by the contract, and that they impliedly promise that, in the meantime neither will do anything to the prejudice of the other inconsistent with that relation. As an example, a man and woman engaged to marry are affianced to one another during the period between the time of the engagement and the celebration of the marriage. In this very case, of traveler and courier, from the day of the hiring till the day when the employment was to begin they were engaged to each other, and it seems to be a breach of an implied contract if either of them renounced the engagement. . . . The man who wrongfully renounces a contract into which he has deliberately entered cannot justly complain if he is immediately sued for a compensation in damages by the man whom he has injured; and it seems reasonable to allow an option to the injured party, either to sue immediately, or to wait till the time when the act was to be done, still holding it as prospectively binding for the exercise of this option, which may be advantageous to the innocent party, and cannot be prejudicial to the wrongdoer." So far as the lord chief justice could perceive an analogy between the engagement between the plaintiff and defendant in that case and an engagement between a man and a woman who are betrothed, his faculty for discovering similitudes is certainly phenomenal. The balance of his reasoning is that the rule that is there laid down is more convenient than the other rule, which squares with legal principle. There is a tacit confession through this entire discussion of the question that the decision is at war with settled principle. And in Frost v. Knight, also, the argument of convenience appears to have had great weight with Lord Chief Justice Cockburn. In Dugan v. Anderson, 86 Md. 567, 11 Am. Rep. 509, the court, while not deciding the question, seems to have been governed in the utterance of its dictum on the subject by considerations of convenience. We agree with the Massachusetts supreme court that the argument of convenience should have no weight as against the demands of legal principle. In Daniels v. Newton, 114 Mass. 580, 19 Am. Rep. 884, the court said: "Much argument is expended in both cases upon the ground of convenience and mutual advantage to the parties from the rule sought to be established. But before that argument can properly have weight, the point to be reached must first be shown to be consistent with logical deductions from the strictly legal aspects of the case. The legal remedy must be founded on some present legal right, and must conform to the nature of that right. Until the plaintiff has either suffered loss or wrong in respect of that which has already vested in him in right, or has been deprived of or prevented from acquiring that which he is entitled to have or demand, he has no ground on which to seek a remedy by way of reparation. The conduct of the defendant is no wrong to the plaintiff until it actually invades some right of his. Actual injury and not anticipated injury is the ground of legal recovery. The plaintiff's rights are invaded by repudiation of the contract only when it produces the effect of nonperformance, or prevents him from entering upon or completing performance on his part, at a time when and in the manner in which he is entitled to perform it or have it performed." And in Frost v. Knight, L. R. 7 Exch. 111, Lord Cockburn declared that the argument founded on convenience should not control, but should be considered only in connection with arguments founded on settled doctrines of the law. He, however, was able to discover, as we have already pointed out, a basis for the English rule in elementary principles; but we are unable to agree with him in this respect, and, such being the case, we have his authority for rejecting the argument of convenience when it stands alone as the supporter of this novel rule. Moreover, we are unable to see wherein business convenience is subserved by the English doctrine. It is subserved thereby only on the theory that to establish a rule for the special advantage of the party who does not proclaim his purpose to violate the contract is to advance the convenience of the business world. The option, under such docrine, is with such party to treat the premature declaration as a breach of the agreement, or to refuse to so treat it. He may decline to consider it a breach, and hold the other party to the contract, the same as though no word inimical thereto had been spoken. Under the guise of furthering business interests, the English rule unfairly discriminates against the party who speaks, and in favor of the one who is silent. The latter may secretly intend not to carry out the agreement. The former may be actuated—indeed, he often is prompted—by the laudable motive of giving the other party timely warning of what he deems at the time his inevitable inability to perform the agreement. On what principle of justice, then, should the law thus discriminate between the parties? If this rule be adopted, then it will not infrequently happen that a party has been held liable for a breach for merely admonishing the other party that a breach is inevitable, when, had he remained silent, no liability could have been enforced against him, because the contract would have been extinguished before the day for performance could arrive, by reason of the death of one of the parties thereto,—the contract being for personal services,—or because of the destruction before that day, without the fault of anyone, of the subject-matter of the agreement. By being allowed to treat the agreement as broken, the party can enforce a liability for substantial, and perhaps very heavy, damages, whereas, if he had been forced to wait until it should be ascertained whether the other party would in fact perform his agreement, the damages then would have been merely nominal, or the latter might have escaped all liability, by reason of the extinguishment of the contract before the day of performance arrived, for the reasons already mentioned. Indeed, the party who sues might himself been unable to perform when the time for performance was reached, and might have been put in default by demand of the other party that the agreement be carried out. If the doctrine of the Hochster Case be sound, then one who has agreed to enter the service of another two years in the future may elect to treat as a breach of the contract an immediate refusal by the employer to fulfil the same, and he may then sue, and the case may be tried before the period for entering upon the discharge of his duties under the contract has arrived. In such a case he would recover full wages, it being impossible to show what he had earned or could have earned during the time he was to have worked for the defendant. And yet subsequent developments may reveal the fact that, so far from being damaged, he was positively benefited, by the fact that he did not enter the defendant's employ. He may during that period earn double the wages he was to have received under the contract, and this, too, in addition to that which he has already collected without doing a stroke of work therefor. Nay, the death of the employer before the day for commencing the performance of the agreement arrives, working an extinguishment thereof, may show that but for his statement the plaintiff could never have collected $1. Undoubtedly the party to whom the refusal is communicated may treat it as an overture for a consent by him to a rescission and rescind the contract. But he has no right to construe as a present breach words which only disclose the probability of a future breach.

Many of the cases which appear to support the doctrine of the Hochster Case are distinguishable on this ground of rescission. It will be found on an analysis of them that all that the party to the contract was seeking to do by his action was to recover on a quantum meruit, on the theory that he rescinded the contract on being informed by the other party that he did not intend to carry it out. The court did not in these cases hold that the contract was broken but merely that, it having been rescinded by mutual consent, the party who had parted with anything of value in the performance of the agreement could recover the value thereof, on an implied promise to pay the same. In Planché v. Colburn, 8 Bing. 14, the plaintiff had a contract with the publishers of a periodical to write a series of articles therefor. The publishers having discontinued the publication, he treated their conduct as justifying a rescission, and rescinded the contract. The action was to recover the value of work already performed by him, at defendants' request, in writing a portion of the articles. It was on this theory that a recovery was sustained. In some of the cases, the party to whom the notice of refusal was given had the option to call for a performance at any time; and, of course, he could elect to regard the time of performance as having arrived, and then treat the refusal as a waiver of tender of performance, and in this way hold the party as for a present breach of the agreement. This element exists in the following cases: Lovelock v. Franklyn, 8 Q. B. 371; Bowdell v. Parsons, 10 East, 359; Newcomb v. Brackett, 16 Mass. 161; Windmuller v. Pope, 107 N. Y. 674; Short v. Stone, 8 Q. B. 358. Of the English cases, we have seen that Phillipotts v. Evans, 5 Mees. & W. 475; Ripley v. McClure, 4 Exch. 345; and Leigh v. Paterson, 8 Taunt. 540, are opposed to the Hochster Case. Mr. Benjamin, also, in his work on Sales (an English work), states the rule the other way, as we have already seen. 2 Benjamin, Sales, § 1118. In Lovelock v. Franklyn, 8 Q. B. 371, Lord Denman intimated that, where the time of performance is fixed, the fact that a party has in the meantime incapacitated himself from performing the contract will not constitute a breach thereof. Frost v. Knight, L. R. 7 Exch. 111, was an action for breach of promise to marry, and stands, as we have seen, on peculiar grounds, not applicable to actions for breach of contracts generally. And in the court of exchequer the doctrine in the Hochster Case was powerfully assailed by the majority of the court. L. R. 5 Exch. 323. Short v. Stone, 8 Q. B. 358, was also such an action. In this case the defendant had not only broken the engagement, but had actually married another person. Planché v. Colburn, 8 Bing. 14, was not an action for breach of contract, but to recover on the theory of a rescission. In Danube & B. S. R. & K. Harbour Co. v. Xenos, 18 C. B. N. S. 825, the action was not brought until after the time for performance had arrived. The defendant never retracted his premature refusal. Therefore, all the court was called upon to decide in that case was that when the day for fulfilment of the agreement was reached the unwritten refusal was a waiver of tender of performance by the plaintiff, and enabled it to sue for breach of contract, the same as though such tender had then been made and refused. There was no occasion for alluding in this case to the doctrine laid down in the Hochster Case. In Aery v. Bouden, 5 El. & Bl. 714, and Reid v. Hoskins, 5 El. & Bl. 729, the court held that the plaintiff could not recover, because he had declined to treat the premature refusal of the other party as a breach. The same result was reached in these cases that would have been reached if the doctrine we believe to be sound had been applied. In Roper v. Johnson, L. R. 8 C. P. 167, and Brown v. Muller, L. R. 7 Exch. 319, we observe the practical working of the rule promulgated by the Hochster Case. Having violated legal principles once, in deciding that case, the courts were forced to violate them a second time, in laying down the rule relating to the measure of damages in such cases. Instead of fixing the value at the time of the premature breach as the element to be considered, the court held that the value at the time for performance, as fixed by the agreement, must be considered. In Roper v. Johnson the court, after speaking of the doctrine of the Hochster Case as a novel doctrine, says: "The difficulty which presents itself here is introduced by the comparatively recent case of Hochster v. De La Tour, the first case which decided that in the case of an executory contract the refusal of one party to perform the contract would justify the other in at once treating such refusal as a breach and suing for damages. That case has been distinctly recognized on many subsequent occasions, and we must now assume it to be law. It has undoubtedly introduced a difficulty in the assessment of damages in similar cases." Judge Keating, after referring to the rule the court would adopt in that case as to the proper measure of damages, said: "I think it is the better and the safer rule, though I am free to confess that the matter is by no means destitute of difficulty,—a difficulty occasioned by the novel doctrine introduced by the case of Hochster v. De La Tour." It must be admitted that the case of Ford v. Tiley, 6 Barn. & C. 325, strongly supports the decision in the Hochster Case.

In this country there appears, from a superficial view of the decisions, to be a great mass of authority in favor of the English doctrine. But a review of adjudications on this side of the water will reveal the fact that there is very little in the way of express authority in America upholding the English rule. The case of Burtis v. Thompson, 43 N. Y. 246, 1 Am. Rep. 516, may be dismissed with the observation that it was an action for breach of promise to marry. In Howard v. Daly, 61 N. Y. 363, 19 Am. Rep. 335, there is a dictum by Commissioner Dwight that the doctrine in the Hochster Case is sound. But the facts did not call for any decision on this point, as the defendant had refused to allow the plaintiff to enter upon the performance of her contract of service after the time for performance had arrived. The other members of the court expressly refused to state their views whether the English rule could be sustained on principle. See page 378, 19 Am. Rep. 293. In Bunge v. Koop, 48 N. Y. 225, 8 Am. Rep.

546, all the court decided was that a premature refusal, unretracted, constitutes a waiver of tender of performance, when the time to fulfill the contract arrives, and that thereafter the plaintiff may sue for breach without showing an offer to perform. In Preer v. Denton, 61 N. Y. 496, and Shaw v. Republic L. Ins. Co. 69 N. Y. 293, the court expressly refuses to determine whether the English rule should be followed. In Ferris v. Spooner, 102 N. Y. 10, the defendant had broken his contract after he had entered upon the performance thereof. The court said: "When therefore, he repudiated the further performance of the contract, the plaintiff was discharged from all obligation to either and set at liberty to enforce his securities for the money already advanced. . . . A previous demand of payment was not essential to a cause of action." In Windmuller v. Pope, 107 N. Y. 674, the court appears to have recognized the English rule, but the case does not show whether the suit was brought before or after the day for performance had arrived. Moreover, the time for the vendors to commence delivery by shipment of the property agreed to be sold had arrived at the time the vendees had declared their purpose not to accept the property under the contract. The vendors appeared to have had an option to deliver at any time between certain dates. When the vendors repudiated the agreement, the time when the vendors might have insisted upon delivery had arrived, although they could, at their option, have made delivery at a later date. The vendors having a right to begin performance at the time the vendees refused to receive the property, the former might, of course, treat the repudiation as a breach. It was not a premature repudiation of the contract, but one which occurred after the time had arrived when the vendees had a right to insist on performance thereof. All that the court held in Crist v. Armour, 34 Barb. 378, was that a premature refusal, unretracted at the time for performance, was a waiver of an offer of performance at that time. In Donoran v. Sheridan, 4 Misc. 433, it appeared that the point that a premature repudiation was not a breach was not made at the trial, and the court declared that therefore it would not be considered. But the court did utter a dictum in favor of the English rule. However, it was based on New York decisions which had not at that time, at least, settled the law in that state in favor of such rule. In Gray v. Green, 9 Hun, 334, the court said: "The effect of a mere refusal has been stated to be, that if before the time arrives at which a party is bound to perform a contract, he expresses an intention to break it, this of itself does not amount to a breach thereof, but if such expression of intention remain unretracted when the time arrives for the other party to perform his part of the contract, this fact will dispense with such performance." In Crabtree v. Meersmith, 19 Iowa, 179, the defendant broke the contract of sale after the time for performance had arrived, by returning the property after possession thereof had been delivered to him. While the English rule is referred to, it is obvious that no question of premature breach was involved. In Holloway v. Griffith, 32 Iowa, 409, 7 Am. Rep. 208, the action was for breach of promise to marry, and the case therefore belongs to the class of cases in which a premature refusal operates as a breach of the implied agreement to continue betrothed until married. In John A. Roebling's Sons' Co. v. Lock Stitch Fence Co. 180 Ill. 680, the defendant refused to perform after it had entered upon the performance of the agreement. In Kadish v. Young, 108 Ill. 170, 43 Am. Rep. 548, the court held that the premature refusal to perform was not a breach, because the other party to the contract had not elected to treat it as a breach. The same result would have been reached in that case if the English doctrine had not been applied. In Fox v. Kitton, 19 Ill. 519, all the court decided was that the innocent party may treat a premature repudiation as an offer to rescind the agreement. In Chamber of Commerce of Chicago v. Sollitt, 43 Ill. 523, it appeared that, while the defendant announced his inability to perform before the time for performance arrived, yet he did not withdraw such refusal to carry out the agreement before such time, and the suit was not brought until the period for fulfillment of the agreement had come and passed. In Follansbee v. Adams, 86 Ill. 14, the parties to the contract, after one of them (the plaintiff) had notified the other (the defendant) that he could not perform, adjusted the matter, and on his adjustment it was agreed that plaintiff owed defendant a certain sum. Thereafter, plaintiff having sued defendant for failure to perform the contract, this settlement was pleaded as a defense. Of course, it was held that it constituted a perfect defense to the action. The contract was, by the act of the party, extinguished before the time for performance arrived. How could there thereafter be any liability thereunder? The court was not called upon to decide whether the plaintiff, by his premature refusal, had broken the agreement. The principle on which the decision rests is that the parties to a contract may, even before performance is due, extinguish it. The scope of the decision is disclosed in the last sentence of the opinion, "We are satisfied, after a careful consideration of the whole record, that the court decided right in holding the contract rescinded." In Lake Shore & M. S. R. Co. v. Richards, 152 Ill. 59, 80 L. R. A. 33, the breach consisted of acts in contravention of the terms of the contract after the time for performance had arrived. The court, indeed, indorses the English doctrine, but what was said on the subject was pure dictum. In Zuck v. McClure, 98 Pa. 541, the court held that a premature repudiation did not constitute a breach, as the innocent party did not elect to so regard it. The result in this case would have been the same if the English rule had not been adopted. In Heard v. Bowers, 23 Pick. 455, the court intimated that, if a party voluntarily puts it out of his power to perform a contract before the day of performance arrives, he by that act breaks the agreement. See page 480. In Dingley v. Oler, 11 Fed. Rep. 372, the court applied the English doctrine; and when this case was decided on appeal in the Federal Supreme Court (117 U. S. 490, 29 L. ed. 984), that court intimated that it considered the English doctrine as sound, but the decision below was reversed on the 88 L. R. A.

ground that, even assuming that doctrine to be preferable, the facts did not bring the case within it, for the reason that no distinct repudiation of the agreement before the time for performance had been shown. In the case of United States v. Smoot, 82 U. S. 15 Wall. 36, 21 L. ed. 107, the court, while leaning very decidedly towards the English rule, held that the case was not brought within its scope, for the same reasons which govern the decision in that court in Dingley v. Oler. In Dugan v. Anderson, 36 Md. 567, 11 Am. Rep. 509, the court, while not called upon to settle the question, indicated that, on the score of convenience, it might, when called upon to settle the point, adopt the English rule. But, as we have already seen, it is indefensible to rest the English doctrine upon the mere ground of convenience, and in this case it appeared that the contract was broken while it was being performed. In Hosmer v. Wilson, 7 Mich. 294, 74 Am. Dec. 716, the action was brought to recover the value of labor expended on materials out of which an engine was to be constructed by plaintiff in error for defendant in error. The defendant in error had repudiated the contract while plaintiff in error was performing it. Of course, this was a breach of the agreement. No question of premature repudiation was involved. In Platt v. Brand, 26 Mich. 175, it would seem that the plaintiff, against whom the defendants sought to set up, by way of recoupment, a claim for damages for a breach of contract to furnish glass, had broken the contract after performance thereof had been entered upon, although at a time anterior to the time when delivery of the installment which he refused to deliver was due. In Wolf v. Marsh, 54 Cal. 223, it appeared that the written instrument sued upon was given on condition that it was not to be enforced until a certain mine should yield a profit to the defendant, and that, if it should not yield a profit to him, the instrument was to be void. The defendant sold the mine, and the court held that the instrument at once became enforceable. By the act of sale the defendant had put it out of his power to make the mine yield a profit to him, and the court therefore very properly held that the instrument could be enforced without waiting future developments. In Sullivan v. McMillan, 26 Fla. 543, the refusal to go on with the contract was made after performance thereof had been entered upon. Therefore no question of premature refusal was involved. The court did not adopt the English doctrine. On the contrary, it stated that the case did not call for a decision on that point. The court said: "The case at bar does not, however, call for an expression of opinion as between the doctrine of Hochster v. De La Tour and that of Daniels v. Newton. It rests upon another and unquestionable doctrine. The time for performance was on when the breach complained of was committed. The contract was entire and not severable in its character, and had been performed in part at least, and upon a breach of the entire contract, it being committed by defendant while the plaintiff was ready and willing to perform, the latter became entitled to recover in one action the same damages as if he had fully performed his contract." In Mattby v. Eisen- hauer, 17 Kan. 309, Justice Brewer said: "To what extent a contract may be held to be broken before the time of performance arrives may not be entirely settled. There are authorities which say that, if, before the time of performing the contract arrives, the promisor expressly renounces the contract, the promisee may treat this as a breach and may at once maintain an action in respect thereof. . . . Several of these cases were for breaches of contracts to marry, and the courts in many express themselves qualifiedly, and as doubtful whether the proposition was correct as applicable generally to all classes of contracts. But be the proposition ever so sound we think it is not applicable here." In Grau v. McVicker, 8 Biss. 13, it was squarely decided that the premature repudiation of an agreement is a present breach thereof. The decision in this case is founded entirely upon Hochster v. De La Tour. In McPherson v. Walker, 40 Ill. 371, all the court decided was that a refusal to perform, not withdrawn before the time of performance, operates as a waiver of an offer to fulfil the agreement at the time stipulated therein. The court, so far from adopting the English doctrine, laid down the very rule we hold to be proper in cases of this kind: "The rule is, if one bound to perform a future act, before the time for doing it declares his intention not to do it, this of itself is no breach of the contract; but, if his declaration be not withdrawn when the time arrives for the act to be done, it constitutes a sufficient excuse for the default of the other party." In Davis v. Grand Rapids School Furniture Co. 41 W. Va. 717, the court follows the English doctrine, but the question was not discussed. The leading decision opposed to the Hochster Case is Daniels v. Newton, 114 Mass. 530, 19 Am. Rep. 334. Nor does it stand alone. It has been followed in Curstens v. McDonald, 38 Neb. 858, and Clark v. National Benefit & C. Co. 67 Fed. Rep. 222. See Kelly v. Oliver, 113 N. C. 442.

That the English courts are not disposed to give the rule in the Hochster Case very wide scope appears to be shown by the fact that nothing short of the most positive repudiation of an agreement will suffice to give the innocent party, at his option, a cause of action when the repudiation is premature. See Mersey Steel & I. Co. v. Naylor, L. R. 9 Q. B. Div. 648; Avery v. Bowden, 5 El. & Bl. 714; Reid v. Hoskins, 6 El. & Bl. 953; Johnstone v. Milling, L. R. 16 Q. B. Div. 460.

Nothing decided by this court in Davis v. Bronson, 2 N. D. 300, 16 L. R. A. 655, conflicts with our ruling in this case. There the plaintiffs and defendants had made a contract for the construction of a creamery. All that was held in that case was that plaintiffs could not, in the face of a refusal to accept, construct the creamery, and then sue the defendant for the contract price. Their remedy was to sue for damages for breach of the contract. When one has contracted to erect for another a building, and the latter, when the time for commencing construction thereof arrives, refuses to permit the builder to enter upon his premises for the purpose of carrying out his contract, it is obvious that the owner of the land has prevented the performance of the contract by the builder, and has therefore been guilty of a breach thereof. Indeed there is eminent authority that notice that one will not stand by an agreement, though given before performance by him is due, is a present breach of the agreement, if at the time it is given the time for the other party to enter upon performance has arrived. Danforth v. Walker, 37 Vt. 214; Hinckley v. Pittsburgh Bessemer Steel Co. 121 U. S. 264, 30 L. ed. 967; Hoamer v. Wilson, 7 Mich. 304, 74 Am. Dec. 716; Sullivan v. McMillan, 26 Fla. 543; Dillon v. Anderson, 43 N. Y. 282; Lamoignon v. Rolfe, 36 N. H. 38; Parker v. Russell, 133 Mass. 74.

Whether this doctrine is sound or whether the better rule is that such notice is merely a waiver of performance, irrevocable in character, inevitably involving an ultimate breach, it is unnecessary for us to decide. If one has agreed to manufacture and deliver certain goods at a specified time, and the other party has agreed to take them, it is evident that a notice to manufacture them is not only a waiver of the manufacture of the articles, but also of the tender of them, in fulfilment of the agreement, and the waiver is irrevocable. To advise a manufacturer that he need not manufacture, because the purchaser will not accept is irrevocably to waive tender on the day for delivery, for he cannot deliver goods of his own manufacture without producing them. But, while a future breach is certain, can it logically be said that it has already taken place? Is it sound to declare, as some of the decisions do, that in such a case the performance by the manufacturer has been prevented? See Cort v. Ambergate, N. & B. & E. Junction R. Co. 17 Q. B. 127. But we express no opinion on this point, as it is not involved. What we do decide is that the letter of September 13, although embodying a positive refusal to perform, did not place it in the power of the plaintiff to treat the contract as broken, assuming that September 30th was the day fixed for performance. But it is undisputed that under the contract the plaintiff might, at his option, have delivered the flax at any time during the month of September. When he received the second letter from the defendants (i. e. the one dated September 18), it was in his power at that time to exercise his option to call for the performance of the agreement. The refusal of the defendants to perform was a standing waiver of tender of performance by the plaintiff, so long as such refusal was not withdrawn, and there is no pretense that it was ever retracted. For the purpose of establishing a party's liability for breach of contract, his refusal to perform, made at the time for performance or made before and not withdrawn at that time, is equivalent to a then offer to perform by the other party, followed by a refusal by the party who so refuses before an offer is made. This is elementary law, and the principle is embodied in our Code. Rev. Codes, §§ 3774, 3820, subd. 3, and § 3823. Had plaintiff been absolutely entitled to performance on the day he received defendant's second refusal to perform, he could, without tender of notice, have treated the contract as then broken. Does the fact that he had only an option to call for fulfilment of the agreement affect his right? We think not, so far as tender is concerned. All that was necessary to entitle him to insist on performance on any day prior to September 30 was notice to the defendants to that effect, and an offer to perform. But the unwidrawn refusal to recognize the contract constituted a waiver of tender of performance. Whether it constituted a waiver of notice that the plaintiff then elected to exercise his option to make an earlier delivery of the flax is another question. It is not claimed that the plaintiff in any manner brought to defendant's notice his purpose to exercise his option to call for performance before September 30. To allow him to wait and watch the fluctuations of the market, and then, after the last day for delivery had passed, claim that he had secretly decided to insist upon performance at a particular time prior thereto, or on the last day itself, according as his interests would be best subserved, would be a dangerous doctrine, and one that there is no necessity for adopting, seeing that it was easy for him to manifest his election in a way that would make it irrevocable, and bring it to the knowledge of the defendants. He should not be afforded the opportunity of playing fast and loose with the rights of the other party, but should be required to declare his purpose, or be held, in the absence of notice to the contrary, to have elected to wait until the last day for performance. Unless this rule is adopted, the vendor, who has an option to deliver at any time within six months, and who is notified by the other party immediately after the contract is made that such other party will not stand by the agreement, could remain quiet during this entire period, and then select such a day as the day when he had elected to call for performance, and therefore as the day of breach, as would give him the largest amount of damages. We hold, therefore, that the plaintiff could not claim that he decided to exercise his opportunity to tender the property before the last day of performance,—i. e. September 30. Indeed, he does not pretend that he is entitled to recover damages on a theory of a breach of the contract at any time between September 13 and September 30. Proceeding on a hypothesis which to us is inexplicable under the circumstances, he seeks to hold defendants responsible for the difference between the contract price and the price he realized on the sale of the 5,000 bushels of flax in Duluth on the 9th of September. That he cannot bind defendants for the purpose of fixing the damages they must pay by the sale in Duluth is obvious for two reasons: First. It was not made in the mode pointed out in the statute. The statute, recognizing a settled rule of the common law, permits the vendor in an executory contract of sale, the title not having passed to the vendee, to treat the property as the property of the vendee, for the sole purpose of fixing the measure of damages, and then proceed to sell it on the theory of the foreclosure of a vendor's lien for the purchase price. The property is to be sold in the manner pointed out by the statute for the sale of pledged property. The vendee is made liable for the deficiency, if any. Rev. Codes, §§ 4833, 4938. But the sale in Duluth was not made in conformity with the provisions of the statute relating to the sale of pledged property. No notice of the time and place of sale was given to the defendants as required by § 4760, Rev. Codes, nor was the sale at public auction, upon the notice to the public usual at the place of sale in respect to auction sales of similar property, as required by § 4763, Rev. Codes. Another conclusive answer to the position taken by plaintiff that he could bind the defendants by the price realized on the sale in Duluth, is that the contract had not then been broken. It is only after breach that the statute permits the vendor to proceed to sell as in case of a pledge, for the purpose of fixing the vendee's liability for the deficiency. Rev. Codes, § 4938.

It is urged that by selling the 5,000 bushels of flax in Duluth, with a view of fixing the defendants' damages, the plaintiff chose his remedy, and hence cannot pursue any other remedy for damages. We are unable to discover that any question of remedy is here involved. If the vendee breaks his contract, the vendor may recover damages according to the rule laid down in subdiv. 2 of § 4988 and § 5009, Rev. Codes, unless he has in fact proceeded under § 4833, and actually fixed the damages thereunder. It is only when the property has been resold in the manner prescribed by § 4833 that the deficiency fixes the measure of damages. If the property has not in fact been resold under that section, then subdiv. 2 of § 4988 and § 5009 point out the true measure of damages. The right to hold the vendor responsible for damages on this theory is not cut off unless the property has in fact been "resold in the manner prescribed by § 4833." A mere attempt to proceed thereunder will not bar the right to damages according to subdiv. 2 of § 4988 and § 5009. Nothing short of an actual sale in the manner prescribed by § 4833 will have such effect. Counsel first contends that damages cannot be recovered on the theory of a sale to foreclose a vendor's lien, because the vendor failed to sell in the manner prescribed by § 4833; and yet, una et eadem flatu, they insist that plaintiff should not be allowed damages under the other subdivision of § 4988,—a claim utterly untenable if this fact be true. They would make an abortive attempt to proceed under § 4833 fatal to the recovery of any damages whatever, although the vendee has not thereby suffered any injury whatsoever. We cannot assent to a position so repugnant to the explicit language of the statute, and so contrary to natural justice.

Having reached the conclusion that the contract was not broken by defendants before September 30, this was the day for performance, as the plaintiff has not elected to make delivery before that time. All that was necessary to put the defendants in default was a tender of performance, followed by their refusal. But an offer by plaintiff on the 30th of September was waived by their unretracted repudiation of the contract. He is deemed to have made it, and to have been met by a refusal. This constitutes a breach as of that day. If, then, there was any evidence tending to support the verdict as to the amount of damages, the verdict must be sustained, although directed by the court. The fact of liability is conclusively established. The defendants having requested the court to direct a verdict in their favor, and the court having instructed the jury to find for the plaintiff, on his motion, the defendants must be regarded as having submitted all controverted facts to the court for decision; no request having been made by them, after their motion for a directed verdict had been overruled, that any question of fact be submitted to the jury. It follows that if there is any evidence at all to support the verdict, in point of damages, the judgment must be affirmed. The defendants by their motion took the position that there was no question of fact which they desired to have submitted to a jury, and cannot complain of the decision of any question of fact on which the evidence is conflicting which the court must be regarded as having made by instructing the jury to find for the plaintiff. After a party has moved the court that the jury be instructed to render a verdict in his favor, he must, if the court denies his motion, specifically request that there be submitted to the jury the questions of fact which he desires to have so submitted. Otherwise he is deemed to have acquiesced in the decision of such questions by the court, and, if the court directs a verdict in favor of the other party, on his motion, the defeated litigant is not in position, in case of his failure to make such requests, to claim that any issue upon which the evidence is conflicting should have been left to the decision of the jury. 2 Thomp. Trials, § 2272; Mayer v. Dean, 115 N. Y. 556, 5 L. R. A. 540; Protost v. McEncroe, 102 N. Y. 650; Winchell v. Hicks, 18 N. Y. 558; Collihan v. Scott, 58 N. Y. 670; Mervin v. Magone, 35 U. S. App. 741, 17 C. C. A. 961, 70 Fed. Rep. 776; Bueteli v. Magone, 157 U. S. 154, 39 L. ed. 654; Chrystie v. Foster, 26 U. S. App. 67, 9 C. C. A. 606, 61 Fed. Rep. 551; Sutler v. Vanderveer, 122 N. Y. 652. It follows, as we have already said, that, if there is any evidence in the case tending to prove the amount of damages for which the verdict was directed, the defendants, not being in position to complain that that question was not settled by the jury, are bound by the finding of the trial court, just as they would have been bound had the verdict been voluntarily rendered by the jury. On the 9th of September, plaintiff sold 5,000 bushels of flax, through brokers in Duluth, and realized 84 cents a bushel from the sale. While this evidence was perhaps competent to prove the value of the flax on the 9th of September, it has no tendency to prove its value at such a time after September 30 as would have sufficed for the seller, acting with reasonable diligence, to effect a sale. Rev. Codes, §§ 4988, 5009, fix the measure of damages in such cases. They provide as follows:

"Sec. 4988. The detriment caused by the breach of a buyer's agreement to accept and pay for personal property, the title to which is not vested in him, is deemed to be: (1) If the property has been resold pursuant to § 4833 the excess, if any, of the amount due from the buyer under the contract, over the net proceeds of the resale; or (2) if the property has not been resold in the manner prescribed by § 4833 the excess, if any, of the amount due from the buyer under the contract over the value to the seller, together with the excess, if any, of the expenses properly incurred in carrying the property to market over those which would have been incurred for the carriage thereof if the buyer had accepted it."

"Sec. 5009. In estimating damages the value of property to a seller thereof is deemed to be the price which he could have obtained therefor in the market nearest to the place at which it should have been accepted by the buyer, and at such time after the breach of the contract as would have sufficed with reasonable diligence for the seller to effect a resale."

In this case, there being no evidence tending to prove the value of the property at Kelso at such time after September 30 as would have sufficed, with reasonable diligence, for the plaintiff to effect a sale thereof, the court had no basis, even on the theory that all issues of fact were submitted to it for decision, for finding the value of the flax at that time. The state of the evidence was such that the plaintiff, while establishing a breach of the contract, had failed to show any actual damages. On the evidence as it stood, the most the plaintiff could have recovered was nominal damages.

For the error of the court in directing a verdict for the plaintiff on the theory that the price realized by him on the sale of the flax in Duluth fixed the measure of his damages, the judgment and the order denying a motion for a new trial are reversed, and a new trial is ordered.

Under the facts of this case, the proper measure of damages is the difference between the price agreed to be paid for the flax and its market value at Kelso, at such time after September 30 as would have sufficed, with reasonable diligence, for the plaintiff to effect a sale thereof, and the excess of expense, if any, mentioned in § 4988, Rev. Codes. See Rev. Codes, § 5009

QUESTIONS reserved by the District Court for Carbon County for the opinion of the Supreme Court in a proceeding to contest the election to the office of treasurer of Carbon County on the ground that certain votes had been counted for defendant which were cast by unqualified voters. Answers in plaintiff's favor.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. C. E. Blydenburgh and N. E. Corthell, for plaintiff:

It is a solemn act to declare a law unconstitutional, and one to be performed only with reluctance and hesitation.

The whole instrument is to be examined. Each clause and section is only a part of a complete and symmetrical structure intended to establish the state upon a sound and enduring basis in which our civil rights are supported by carefully guarded political privileges.

The Constitution is intended to be a practical and working instrument.

Almost every tongue known to the civilized world is spoken here by persons who know no other. Is it to be supposed that the members of the convention intended that the Constitution should be turned into these multifarious languages and authentic copies of all furnished to the registration and election officers in each precinct?

The great inconvenience, if not the impossibility, of thus carrying out the construction contended for by the defendant, is a well recognized and useful test to apply in determining its reasonableness and fitness.

When an inquiry is directed to ascertain the purpose sought to be accomplished by a particular provision, it may be proper to examine the proceedings of the convention which framed the instrument; and where the proceedings clearly point out the purpose of the provision, the aid will be valuable and satisfactory.

Cooley, Const. Lim. 80.

If the statute of the state, as contended for by counsel for plaintiff, in express terms provided that there should be no proof except an actual reading of the Constitution in the English language in the presence of the registry agents, this would be to add to the Constitution qualifications of the right of suffrage not contained in that instrument.

Cooley, Const. Lim. pp. 78, 79, and note, p. 758.

Potter, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The plaintiff brought this action in the district court to contest the election of defendant to the office of county treasurer of Carbon county. The plaintiff and defendant were opposing candidates for that office at the election held on the 3d day of November, 1896. According to the abstract of votes made by the county board of canvassers, the defendant was credited with 1,189 votes, and the plaintiff with 1,162 votes, and a certificate of election was issued to the defendant. The case was submitted to the district court upon an agreed statement of facts, whereupon that court ordered that certain important and difficult questions arising in said case be reserved to this court for its decision thereon. The questions thus reserved involve all of the votes mentioned and specifically described in the statement of facts upon which the legality of defendant's election is questioned. Such questions are 14 in number. The first 9, respectively and separately, inquire whether or not the votes mentioned in paragraphs 5 to 12, inclusive, and in paragraph 17, of the statement of facts, are legal votes. The 10th and 11th questions seek the decision of that court respecting the number of votes, if any, which should be deducted from the votes returned and abstracted for the plaintiff and defendant, respectively; and the 12th and 13th, the number of legal votes received by the plaintiff and defendant, respectively. The 14th question, which is general, and embraces all the others, is: "What judgment should be rendered in this action?" The principal point of controversy in the case arises in relation to the 1st and 6th reserved questions. Question No. 1 is: "Are the votes mentioned in paragraph 5 of the statement legal votes?" Paragraph 5 of the statement reads as follows: "At said election in precinct No. 1 of election district No. 6 of said county, known as 'Hanna Precinct,' 54 votes were cast for the said defendant by natives of Finland, naturalized citizens of the United States, who were not able to read the Constitution of the state of Wyoming in English, and who were not prevented by physical disability from complying with the requirements of § 9, art. 6, of the Constitution of the state of Wyoming, and who did not have the right to vote in the territory of Wyoming at the time of the adoption of the Constitution of said state, but who could read a proper translation or interpretation of such Constitution in the Finnish language, which said votes were by the judges of election in said precinct counted and returned for the said defendant." Question No. 6 refers to the votes mentioned in paragraph No. 10 of the statement, and that paragraph presents similar facts as in paragraph 5 with respect to fifty votes cast for defendant at Carbon precinct.

A determination respecting the legality of the votes mentioned in the said two paragraphs depends upon the import of that provision of our Constitution which requires what is known as an "educational qualification" for the right of suffrage. The particular constitutional provisions affecting this matter are as follows: "The rights of citizens of the state of Wyoming to vote and hold office shall not be denied or abridged on account of sex. Both male and female citizens of this state shall equally enjoy all civil, political, and religious rights and privileges." Article 6, § 1. "Every citizen of the United States of the age of twenty-one years and upwards who has resided in the state or territory one year and in the county wherein such residence is located sixty days next preceding any election shall be entitled to vote at such election, except as herein otherwise provided." Id. § 2. "No person shall have the right to vote who shall not be able to read the Constitution of this state. The provisions of this section shall not apply to any person prevented by physical disability from complying with its requirements." Id. § 9. "Nothing herein contained shall be construed to deprive any person of the right to vote who has such right at the time of the adoption of this Constitution, unless disqualified by the restrictions of § 6 of this article. After the expiration of five years from the time of the adoption of this Constitution none but citizens of the United States shall have the right to vote." Id. § 10. Section 6 excludes from the elective franchise all idiots, insane persons, and persons convicted of infamous crimes, unless restored to civil rights. It is further required that all elections shall be by ballot; that the legislature shall provide by law for the printing of the names of all candidates for the same office to be voted for at any election upon the same ballot at public expense, to be delivered on election day to the voters, within the polling place, by sworn public officials; and that only such ballots shall be received and counted, the privilege being saved to the voters, however, of writing upon the ballot the name of any other candidate. Absolute privacy in the preparation of ballots is required to be guaranteed, and the legislature is required to pass laws to secure the purity of elections and guard against the abuse of the elective franchise.

The following clause of § 9 is the cause of this controversy: "No person shall have the right to vote who shall not be able to read the Constitution of this state." It is contended on behalf of plaintiff that this requires an ability to read the Constitution in the English language. On the other hand, it is insisted that the clause is not restricted to that language. The question has not been free from embarrassment. We are profoundly impressed with the gravity and deep significance of this question, appreciating the fact that the decision of the case at bar is but a single instance of the interests which are involved. Not only are the votes to be affected which were cast at Hanna and Carbon in 1896 by native Finlanders, unable to read the Constitution in English, but their right, as well, to vote at subsequent elections, and also the qualification of others in a similar situation; so that the question is one of vital interest to many of our citizens from an individual standpoint, and in its possible result upon elections the entire people are concerned. No person in this state is now permitted to exercise the elective franchise who is not a native-born or naturalized citizen of the United States. If one is foreign born, he must have resided in this country for such a length of time, and have become sufficiently attached to our institutions, to authorize his naturalization. The question therefore is whether such a person, otherwise qualified, is denied the right to vote because his acquaintance with the English language is too limited to enable him to read the Constitution in that language, notwithstanding that he has learned to read in his own language, and in such language can read the Constitution. The primary principle underlying an interpretation of Constitutions or statutes is that the intent is the vital part and the essence of the law. Sutherland, Stat. Constr. § 234; People, Jackson, v. Potter, 47 N. Y. 375. "The object of construction, as applied to a written Constitution, is to give effect to the intent of the people in adopting it. In the case of all written laws, it is the intent of the lawgiver that is to be enforced." Cooley, Const. Lim. 55. Such intent, however, is that which is embodied and expressed in the statute or instrument under consideration. "This intent is to be found in the instrument itself." Ibid.; Sutherland, Stat. Constr. § 234. If the language employed is plain and unambiguous, there is no room left for construction. It must be presumed that in case of a Constitution the people have intended whatever has been plainly expressed. Courts are not at liberty to depart from that meaning which is plainly declared. The remarks of Mr. Justice Brounson in People v. Purdy, 2 Hill, 86, have been frequently quoted with approval. Commenting upon different opinions which were held respecting the purpose and effect of a certain clause of the state Constitution, and the effect of departing from the language used, he said: "In this way a solemn instrument, for so I think the Constitution should be considered, is made to mean one thing by one man, and something else by another, until in the end it is in danger of being rendered a mere dead letter; and that, too, where the language is so plain and explicit that it is impossible to make it mean more than one thing, unless we first lose sight of the instrument itself and allow ourselves to roam at large in the boundless field of speculation. For one, I dare not venture upon such a course. Written Constitutions of government will soon come to be regarded as of little value if their injunctions may be thus lightly overlooked; and the experiment of setting a boundary to power will prove a failure. We are not at liberty to presume that the framers of the Constitution, or the people who adopted it, did not understand the force of language." In that case the question was whether the words "any body politic or corporate" embraced all corporations, whether public or private. In the case of People, Hughes v. May, 8 Mich. 603, the court stated the principle as follows: "Among the well-settled rules of construction of statutes are these: (1) The natural import of the words of any legislative act, according to the common use of them when applied to the subject-matter of the act, is to be taken as expressing the intention of the legislature, unless the intention so resulting from the ordinary import of the words be repugnant to sound acknowledged principles of public policy; . . . and (2) if the subject of the statute relates to courts or legal proofs, the words of the legislature are to be construed technically, unless from the statute it appears that the terms were used in a more popular sense. . . . These rules are equally applicable in the construction of a Constitution—as the Constitution is law, the people having been the legislators, as much as a statute is law, the senators and representatives being the legislators." And again: "The natural import of words is that which their utterance promptly and uniformly suggests to the mind,—that which common use has affixed to them." In Hawkins v. Carroll County Supers, 50 Miss. 785, we find a statement of the same principle as follows: "To get at the thought or meaning expressed in a statute, a contract, or a Constitution, the first resort, in all cases, is to the natural signification of the words, in the order of grammatical arrangement in which the framers of the instrument have placed them. If the 'words' convey a definite meaning, which involves no absurdity or contradiction with other parts of the instrument, then that meaning apparent on the face of the instrument is the one which alone we are at liberty to say was intended to be conveyed; and neither the courts nor the legislature have a right to add to or take from that meaning." And, again: "The object of construction applied to the Constitution is to give effect to the intent of its framers, and the people in adopting it. This intent is to be found in the instrument itself." Newell v. People, Phelps, 7 88 L. R. A.

N. Y. 97. "It is not allowable to interpret what has no need of interpretation, and, when the words have a definite and precise meaning, to go elsewhere in search of conjecture in order to restrict or extend the meaning. Statutes and contracts should be read and understood according to the natural and most obvious import of the language, without resorting to subtle and forced construction for the purpose of either limiting or extending their operation." Beardstown v. Virginia, 76 Ill. 84; McCluskey v. Cromwell, 11 N. Y. 601.

The presumption is that language has been employed with sufficient precision to convey the intent. Cooley, Const. Lim. 55; Hills v. Chicago, 60 Ill. 86. Chief Justice Marshall, in the case of Gibbons v. Ogden, 22 U. S. 9 Wheat. 183, 6 L. ed. 68, said: The framers of the Constitution "and the people who adopted it, must be understood to have employed words in their natural sense, and to have intended what they have said." See also Springfield v. Edwards, 84 Ill. 626, 632. In an early interesting case in Massachusetts, the court was called upon to expound the true meaning of that clause of the Constitution which required that representatives should be chosen by written votes: and the precise question as presented was whether printed votes are written votes. It was held that "printed votes were legal." In the course of the opinion, Chief Justice Parker used the following language: "In construing so important an instrument as a Constitution, especially those parts which affect the vital principle of a republican government, the elective franchise, or the manner of exercising it, we are not, on the one hand, to indulge ingenious speculations which may lead us wide from the true sense and spirit of the instrument; nor, on the other, to apply to it such narrow and constrained views as may exclude the real object and intent of those who framed it. We are to suppose that the authors of such an instrument had a thorough knowledge of the force and extent of the words they employ, that they had a beneficial end and purpose in view, and that more especially in any apparent restriction upon the mode of exercising the right of suffrage, there was some existing or anticipated evil which it was their purpose to avoid." Henshaw v. Foster, 9 Pick. 312. The Constitution derives its force from the people who adopted it, and it is the intention of the people which is to be sought for. Cooley, Const. Lim. 6. And that learned author says: "It is not to be supposed that they have looked for any dark or abstruse meaning in the words employed, but rather that they have accepted them in the sense most obvious to the common understanding, and ratified the instrument in the belief that that was the sense designed to be conveyed." Further, the meaning of the Constitution is fixed when it is adopted, and it is not different at any subsequent time when a court has occasion to pass upon it. Id. 155; Chesapeake & O. R. Co. v. Miller, 19 W. Va. 408. In this connection, Judge Cooley, in his work on Constitutional Limitations, made some observations which are so pertinent that I quote them: "A Constitution is not to be made to mean one thing at one time, and another at some subsequent time when the circumstances may have so changed as perhaps to make a different rule seem desirable. A principal share of the benefit expected from written Constitutions would be lost if the rules they established were so flexible as to bend to circumstances or be modified by public opinion. It is with special reference to the varying moods of public opinion, and with a view to putting the fundamentals of government beyond their control, that these instruments are framed. . . . What a court is to do, therefore, is to declare the law as written, leaving it to the people themselves to make such changes as new circumstances may require." Cooley, Const. Lim. 54, 55. So, the language of the Constitution is to be understood in the sense in which it was used at the time when it was adopted. Hale v. Everett, 58 N. H. 9, 125, 16 Am. Rep. 82; Opinion of the Justices, 126 Mass. 557, 589.

Is there ambiguity in the language of the first clause of § 9 of article 6, or does it possess a definite and precise meaning? If it is plain, clear, and free from ambiguity, what meaning is expressed thereby? This clause is not connected with any other part of the Constitution which tends to explain or modify it. It is an independent provision, and its meaning must be found disclosed within its own terms. The subject-matter of the article in which it appears is "Suffrage." It prescribes the qualifications of electors. In gathering the intent from the language employed in a law covering that subject, there are certain additional rules of construction which should be observed. Statutes which confer or extend the elective franchise should be liberally construed. Sutherland, Stat. Constr. § 441. The voter must, without any undue straining of the language in any direction, come within the terms of the law, and all reasonable doubts should be resolved in his favor. "Such is the fair tendency of our institutions." People v. Dean, 14 Mich. 406, 417. As a reasonable corollary of those principles, we think it should follow that any provision which excludes any class of citizens from the exercise of the elective franchise ought to receive a strict construction, without, however, doing violence to or distorting the language, to the end that none shall be held excluded who are not clearly designated. Such a rule would seem to be the natural and reasonable outgrowth of the fundamental principles of our form of government. The sovereignty resides in the people, although by written constitutions they have delegated the exercise of sovereign powers to several departments. The people "retain in their own hands a power to control the governments they create so far as they thought it needful to do so, and the three departments are responsible to and subject to be ordered, directed, changed, or abolished by them. But this control and direction must be exercised in the legitimate mode previously agreed upon." Cooley, Const. Lim. 598. "Participation in the elective franchise is a privilege rather than a right, and it is granted or denied on grounds of general policy; the prevailing view being that it should be as general as possible consistent with the public safety." Id. 599. The sovereign power residing primarily in all the people, but in fact and practically with those only who possess the right of suffrage, it would seem that none who are not clearly embraced in any restriction upon such right should be excluded.

From an orderly and logical standpoint, the initial step in arriving at a correct interpretation of the provision that "no person shall have the right to vote who shall not be able to read the Constitution of this state" is an inquiry respecting the ordinary and obvious meaning of the words employed, according to their arrangement and connection. Independently of the specification of a particular instrument which a voter must be able to read, an ability to read necessarily implies some language; but the requirement that a person, as a condition precedent to the right to vote, shall be able to read, is inseparably connected with a definite instrument. The sense in which the framers of the Constitution, and the people in adopting it, employed the phrase "the Constitution of this state," must be determined from a consideration of its relation to the remainder of the clause. The Constitution is mentioned as something which one must possess an ability to read. With this idea in view, the true significance of the word "Constitution," as used in this section, becomes a matter for serious investigation. In its most general sense, a Constitution is defined as "that body of rules and maxims in accordance with which the powers of sovereignty are habitually exercised." Cooley, Const. Lim. 2. In a lecture forming one of a series delivered by the late Mr. Justice Miller upon the Federal Constitution, he said: "The term 'Constitution' may be applied, not improperly, to the guiding principles underlying all these varying forms of government, whether they are or are not, established by any written instrument." Miller, Const. 68. Comprehensively considered, therefore, a Constitution consists in the fundamental principles of government; and, as thus understood, the use of the term would not be inapplicable in referring to almost any kind of established human government. Under such an enlarged definition, however, it might be either written or unwritten. The principles thereof might rest solely upon the will of an absolute monarch. It is manifest that we are not at liberty to entertain so broad a view of word as it is found employed in the clause under consideration. It is this country it is invariably understood and received as indicating something less than that which is embraced within its comprehensive definition. In the language of Judge Cooley: "In American constitutional law, the word 'Constitution' is used in a restricted sense, as implying the written instrument agreed upon by the people of the Union, or any one of the states, as the absolute rule of action and decision for all departments and officers of the government, in respect to all the points covered by it, which must control until it shall be changed by the authority which established it." Cooley, Const. Lim. 8. And Mr. Justice Miller, in further defining it, did so as follows: "In America when we speak of a Constitution, we refer to a written instrument, one in which the powers granted and duties imposed by it are reduced to writing." And again: "A Constitution, in the American sense of the word, is a written instrument by which the fundamental powers of the government are established, limited, and defined, and by which these powers are distributed among several departments, for their more safe and useful exercise, for the benefit of the body politic." And he added: "A search for a more satisfactory definition has been in vain, but this language perhaps, fairly expresses the meaning of the term in this country." Miller, Const. [86] 71. In the case of State v. Parkhurst, 9 N. J. L. *427 [528] at page *448 [548], the court defined it in the following language: "What is a Constitution? According to the common acceptance of the word in these United States, it may be said to be an agreement of the people, in their individual capacities, reduced to writing, establishing and fixing certain principles for the government of themselves." It would be difficult to ascribe any different meaning than the American one, as above defined and explained, to the term, as it is found in the article on suffrage in our Constitution. When the word was used, the convention was engaged in formulating, and the people afterwards in ratifying and adopting, a written instrument containing organic rules for their government. They were proceeding to organize and establish a state, and to lay down in written form certain fixed and inflexible principles and mandates, which should, until legally changed, be adhered to by all departments and officials, and by the people themselves. It is self-evident that the common acceptance of the word "Constitution" elsewhere in this country was the sense in which they understood and employed it in providing that one qualification for an elector should consist in an ability to read the Constitution of this state, which was in writing and existed in no other condition. Thus, in giving to the world as large a meaning as it is capable of imparting in its relation to the other words of the section, it signifies a written instrument only. In that sense we have the natural, ordinary, and obvious meaning of the term, and in that sense we are to determine the essential qualities of an ability to read it.

Whether a person, in reality, is capable of reading it by reading a translation in some language other than English depends upon a correct solution of the question whether such a translation is in fact the Constitution, or is in truth and common acceptance a copy of it. In pursuing such an inquiry, the path has been enveloped in some obscurity by the fact that no reference to any particular language is found in the section, and the further fact, which seems reasonably certain, that such omission occurred by design. The circumstance which indicates that purpose is the strong probability that the source of our provision is to be found in the Constitution of Massachusetts, the phraseology of which closely corresponds to that of our own, but follows the word "Constitution" with the words "in the English language;" thus explicitly and expressly confining the ability to read to that language. In the place of those added words in the Massachusetts Constitution we have used the words "of this state." Reference to the debates of the constitutional convention discloses that the confessed author of the proposition cited the case of Massachusetts, and alluded to the fact that in that commonwealth a voter was required to be able to read the Constitution in English. Such omission, under all the circumstances, is supposed to positively indicate, not only a purpose to omit the words above mentioned, but an intention that there need not exist an ability to read in English. A majority of, if not all, the members of the court, have been strongly impressed with that argument; and the position has seemed not only plausible, but to some extent reasonable. Its very plausibility has courted careful investigation and analysis. It cannot fail, upon reflection, to be observed that the omission of the words deemed to assume so great an importance may have designedly and understandingly occurred, but that, nevertheless, the fact alone of the omission may not demonstrate with reasonable conclusiveness an intention to depart from the Massachusetts requirement. We must, I apprehend, assume that the convention understood the ordinary import of the language they did employ; and if, without the use of the omitted words, the import would be identically the same, it becomes evident that the mere act of omission would not unerringly point to a contrary intention. Placing reliance alone upon the omission, if there is a palpable and definite meaning to be discerned in the language actually used, which would constitute the sense in which such language is commonly accepted, the court would not be at liberty to depart from that meaning. For the very reason that it is possible that the omitted words may have been considered unnecessary, it would be clearly unsafe to impute to even a purposed omission a conclusive indication of but one intent and purpose behind it. The fact that in the convention the provision of the other state was mentioned, we have also thought, disclosed a purpose to otherwise regulate the matter in this state. We are still somewhat of that opinion, but the difficulty in the way of allowing that fact to have more than persuasive influence rests in the proposition that, to do so, we must attribute such intention to the convention itself, and to the people adopting the instrument, when it may be true, for all that we can know, that but few may have heard or learned of the remarks referred to. The committee of the convention on suffrage, which reported the article on that subject, and as regards the first clause of § 9, in the condition it is now found, except a provision for its taking effect at a date a few years later, was composed of the author of the proposition, three members of the legal profession, the president of the state university, and the secretary of the convention, all of them being men of education and ability. With the exception of the gentlemen hereinbefore referred to and one other, none of the committee appear to have given voice to any expression indicative of a purpose to avoid whatever may be the full force and effect of the provision as it stands. The other member above alluded to addressed the convention, but not at length, several times during the consideration of the article on suffrage. He expressed the opinion that many foreign-born citizens who were not conversant with English could read the Constitution in their own language, if it was put into that language, and that they would vote the same as others. He subsequently, in voting in favor of the article, stated that the educational qualification was very objectionable to him; but it does not appear whether that was because it went too far or not far enough. Another prominent member of the committee addressed the convention at some length, and stated that what was desired was that a man should be able to read the ballot that he casts. This same opinion was similarly expressed by at least one other member of the convention during the debates.

The debates of the convention are not a very reliable source of information upon the subject of the construction of any particular word or provision of the Constitution. As we understand the current of authority and the tendency of the courts, they may for some purpose, but in a limited degree, be consulted in determining the interpretation to be given some doubtful phrase or provision; but, as a rule, they are deemed an unsafe guide. In this case the debates are rather unsatisfactory. It is difficult to reconcile them upon the understanding which may have prevailed respecting the real scope of the educational qualification. There appears to have existed quite a divergence of views concerning the number of persons who would be affected by the provision, and we are at a loss to satisfactorily determine whether that difference of opinion, or rather of statement, grew out of a difference of conception of the purport of the language or not. So that, even were it entirely proper to extract the intention of the convention from the discussions favoring and opposing the measure, it would in this instance be utterly useless to attempt it, with the expectation of arriving at any positive or certain result. In fact, counsel on both sides have cited confidently the remarks of various members as supporting their respective views and arguments. Nevertheless, did a determination depend solely upon the intention to be discovered in the proceedings and discussions of the convention, and did it become our duty to locate the preponderance of intent therefrom, we would be inclined to regard them, together with the omission of the words above alluded to, as indicating a purpose on the part of some of the members at least to refrain from requiring an ability to read in English. The effect, if any, which such individual purpose may have upon the real question at bar, is to be controlled by the result of a further consideration of the language which was chosen as the ultimate expression of the intention of the framers of the Constitution and the people adopting it. English was and is the language in common and general use in this state. The legislative enactments, from the organization of the territory, had uniformly been expressed and published only in that language. The proceedings of the courts were and are conducted exclusively in English. In the constitutional convention no other language was employed, the Constitution itself being framed and expressed in that language. It has never been promulgated in any other. These facts, in addition to their influence upon the true meaning of the term "Constitution," should also be kept in view if it becomes proper or necessary to go outside of the phraseology to discover the prevailing intent of those who prepared the organic law. Such facts have therefore a double bearing. They serve to illustrate and explain the words themselves, and are factors in the search for any purpose behind them. They are important in either respect.

After much reflection, we are constrained to announce ourselves as unable to observe any ambiguity in the words "the Constitution of this state." Under the well-considered definitions above quoted, they possess and convey a meaning which is precise, clear, and certain. We revert, therefore, to the question whether a translation would constitute a "copy" of the Constitution, in the commonly accepted sense of that word. A "copy" is defined as a reproduction or imitation as of a writing, printing, drawing, painting, or other work of art, so as to have another or others similar to the original. Standard Dict. It is a document which is taken or written from another, as opposed to an original. 1 Rapalje & L. Law Dict. 293. To translate is to give the sense or equivalent of, as a word, an expression, or an entire work, in another language or dialect (Standard Dict. 1917); hence to explain by clearer terms, or to express in a different form or style of language (Ibid.). The question whether a translation constitutes a copy of a book was squarely decided in the case of Stowe v. Thomas, 2 Wall. Jr. 547. That case involved an alleged infringement of the copyright of Mrs. Stowe's Uncle Tom's Cabin, the defendant Thomas having made a translation in German. Mr. Justice Grier, in the opinion, said: "Now, although the legal definition of a 'book' may be much more extensive than that given by lexicographers, and may include a sheet of music as well as a bound volume; yet, it necessarily conveys the idea of thought or conceptions clothed in language or in musical characters, written, printed, or published. Its identity does not consist merely in the ideas, knowledge, or information communicated, but in the same conceptions clothed in the same words, which make it the same composition. A 'copy' of a book must, therefore, be a transcript of the language in which the conceptions of the author are clothed; of something printed and embodied in a tangible shape. The same conceptions clothed in another language cannot constitute the same composition, nor can it be called a transcript or 'copy' of the same 'book.'" And the learned justice refers to a remark of Mr. Justice Willes, viz.: "Wherein consists the identity of a book? Certainly, bona fide limitations, translations, and abridgments are different, and, in respect of property, may be considered new works." Generally speaking, a translation need not consist of transferring from one language into another; it may apply to the expression of the same thoughts in other words of the same language.

We apprehend that if someone should undertake to embody the principles and rules set out in our Constitution in other words of our language, and rewrite the whole instrument by the use of different words, but expressing the same sense, such a work could not in any correct sense, legal or otherwise, be denominated the Constitution of this state, or even a copy of it; and it is probable that no one would long contend that it could be. A translation into another language might just as completely preserve, and the work composed of such translation might truly communicate, the sense of the Constitution. All its rules, maxims, and definitions might be found therein stated, but it would not be considered a copy. The substance of its mandates would have been copied, but not the words and language. We have shown in an earlier part of this opinion that, according to the American understanding of the word, the term "Constitution" is not merely the fundamental principles of government, but the written instrument containing them, or such principles reduced to writing. Hence it is clear that a work reproducing such principles only cannot constitute, in any correct sense, a copy of the Constitution, as it is usually understood and accepted. We are convinced that a copy of that instrument can consist only in a reproduction of the words of which it is composed, in the same relation as they are there found, and thus, as a necessary consequence, in the language in which it is written. No doctrine of statutory construction will permit the adoption of loose and reckless expressions, such as calling a "translation" of the Constitution a "copy" would amount to.

Again, we search in vain for any provision in the Constitution respecting its publication or the manner in which it shall be promulgated. Under the provisions for the publishing of the laws enacted at the various legislative sessions, there appearing no express statutory regulation to the contrary, it would doubtless be presumed that they were to be published in the language in which they were written and passed. That presumption has been uniformly acted on by the officials of the executive department. Analogous doctrines are found in the decisions. In the case of Road in Upper Hanover, 44 Pa. 277, the court said, in considering a notice about roads which had been published in a German newspaper in the German language: "The law must have a definite meaning, and, therefore it cannot mean that public notice may be given in any language that one of the parties may choose to employ, but in the ordinary language of the country which is used in judicial proceedings." In another case we find the following: "When a statute directs notice to be published in a newspaper, the courts will presume, in the absence of anything to the contrary, that the legislature designed the notice to be published in the same language as the newspaper itself. . . . They will also presume that the notice is to be given in the ordinary language of the state. . . . The present statute contains no express intimation as to the language in which the notice is to be given or the newspaper is to be printed. Consequently, the presumptions mentioned arise, and require the notice to be given in English in a newspaper printed in the same tongue." State, City Publishing Co., v. Jersey City, 54 N. J. L. 487. In the state of Louisiana, under the Constitution of 1812, all laws were required to be promulgated and preserved in the language in which the Constitution of the United States is written; and, in construing a statute passed while that Constitution was in force, the court refused to consider or attach any force to a French translation, although it is apparent that it was customary for the statutes to be translated into French, but whether with or without legislative authority we are not informed. State v. Mir, 8 Rob. (La.) 549. In the case of People, Hughes, v. May, 8 Mich. 604, the Michigan court said that "a Constitution is law, the people having been the legislators." In that law—the organic law of the state, which could only have been adopted originally by the people, and is not susceptible of any ultimate change, except with their consent or, more correctly speaking, their positive act—no provision was made with reference to the language in which it was to be promulgated. It seems to us that the same presumptions which have been adverted to must be held to apply; and, consequently, that it was and is to be published in the English language, the same in which it was written, and which is the language of the country. It is impossible, therefore, that there can exist any authorized publication of the Constitution in any other language, for any purpose of construction or enforcement. We are not prepared to deny the power of the legislature to provide for translations of that instrument for some limited purposes,—for instance, to inculcate a more general knowledge of its rules and principles, and of the character of our local government; but under no circumstances could a court resort to such a translation as possessing any force or authority.

It follows that the word "Constitution," mentioned as the instrument which a voter must be able to read, is to be understood and construed with reference to the presumption arising from an absence of authority given by the people to publish it in any language or form other than that in which it was written, and which is the language in common and general use. The Constitution is a law. It is the fundamental, inflexible law in written form, which controls, limits, and orders the powers of all departments of government. We are thus led to inquire regarding the essential feature of that law, as something which may be read. In what character and form is it endowed with living force? At the outset, this appeared to lead into an original field for judicial investigation. It is comparatively a new question, but at least on two occasions the courts have considered the character and effect of a translation of a statute or law. Those cases are directly in point. In State, North Orange Baptist Church, v. Orange, 54 N. J. L. 111, 14 L. R. A. 62, the legality of a municipal ordinance was involved. The charter required that all ordinances, after their passage, should be published in all three of the newspapers published in the city of Orange. One of the papers was printed in the German language. Another requirement respecting ordinances concerning a public improvement was that a notice of the contemplated improvement should be given by publishing a copy of the proposed ordinance, and a statement of the time and place of the meeting of the common council appointed to consider said ordinance, in the same three papers. The notice of the time and place of meeting was printed in the German paper, as in the other two, in the English language; and the ordinance was published in the German newspaper, in a German translation only. It was held that the notice of the time and place should have been published in the German paper in the German language, as the statute required its publication in that paper, and a notice requires no collocation of words so long as it conveys a clear notion of its subject, and in a German newspaper the medium through which intelligence is communicated is the German language. In reference to the ordinance it was held a mistake to publish it in the German language, and that, even as a part of the notice, it should have been published in the German paper in English. And the court said: "But a statute or ordinance has no legal existence except in the language in which it is passed. No translation, however accurate, can be adopted in the place of its original text for the purposes of construction in a legal proceeding. Until the legislature makes a provision for the printing of ordinances in German newspapers in translation, it is not perceived how they can be printed otherwise than litera et verbis. The publication of the translation may be regarded as a proper explanatory adjunct of the English copy, but cannot be accepted as a legal substitute for it." In the Louisiana case (State v. Mir, 8 Rob. (La.) 549) the court was employed in construing a statute, and a French translation thereof was called to its attention. This translation seemed to convey a different meaning from that of the English text. As in that state both languages were in quite general use, a liberal quotation from the opinion of the court cannot fail to be useful: "Anterior to the adoption of the Constitution, the laws of the territory were passed and promulgated in the two languages; and our civil tribunals have repeatedly and invariably decided that the one was as much entitled to respect as the other. These decisions contain a proper exposition of the law as it then existed. The Constitution, however, which is the supreme law, appears to have formally abrogated and abolished what was no doubt, up to that time, the settled law upon the subject. In the 15th section of the 6th article of the Constitution, it is enacted, that 'all laws that may be passed by the legislature, and the public records of this state, and the judicial and legislative written proceedings shall be promulgated, preserved, and conducted in the language in which the Constitution of the United States is written.' The language here used is as clear and unambiguous as that found in the section of the act of 1829, on which we have just been commenting. If all the laws passed by the legislature are to be promulgated, preserved, and conducted . . . in the language in which the Constitution of the United States is written, and that language is English, it is difficult to imagine how an act which has not been thus promulgated, preserved, or conducted, can be considered as possessing the stringent force, power, and effect which is necessary to constitute a law. It would be a petitio principii to say that it has been promulgated, conducted, and preserved in the English language, because, in that case there would be no necessity of resorting to the French translation." The opinion from which the above is quoted, it will be observed, distinctly holds that, except as preserved and promulgated in the English language, the statute did not have the force and power of a law. That is equivalent to saying that the translation is not the statute; and by analogy, applied to the matter here under discussion, it would follow that a translation of the Constitution would not be the Constitution. In the state of Connecticut the Constitution, by an amendment in 1855, provides that "every person shall read any article of the Constitution, or any section of the statutes of this state, before being admitted as an elector." We have not been able to find any report of a judicial construction of that amendment, and have every reason to be satisfied that it has not been before the courts for that purpose; but so far as we know the custom in that state has invariably been to require a reading in English, and that it has not been suggested that a reading of a translation would answer the constitutional requirement.

The two cases above referred to are the only ones coming to our notice wherein the precise nature of a translation of a law into another language was involved and determined. They refused to brand such a translation as either the law itself or a copy of it. It is essentially something else. It is so entirely distinct from the law that a mention of the latter as an entity, considered as a written instrument, will not include it. No decision to the contrary has been cited, and we have found none.

From what has been said, the proposition, to us, seems irresistible that to authorize such an interpretation of the constitutional provision as would confer upon a person the right to vote if he is able to read a translation of the Constitution in another language renders it necessary to entirely depart from the clear, commonly accepted meaning of the language employed, and, in doing so, to enter upon a field of almost boundless speculation, with the reasonably certain assurance that in such an investigation a like conviction from the ascertainable facts would not be imparted to all minds, however honestly and conscientiously the investigation may be conducted.

The debates of the constitutional convention have been referred to. In all probability there would occur no disagreement, after a careful scrutiny of those debates, regarding the general purpose the convention had in view by the adoption of the educational qualification. Throughout all the discussion a particular class of voters was prominently mentioned. That was what was called the uneducated foreign element in the coal-mining camps along the line of the Union Pacific Railroad. They were by some spoken of as ignorant of our institutions, and it was claimed that they were not intelligent voters. It would seem that had it been the positive intention not to deprive a foreign-born citizen of the right to vote in case he was sufficiently educated in his own language to enable him to read a translation of the Constitution, that intention would have been expressed, or some provision would have been made for translations. Had some such provision been made, there might have been room for modifying the ordinary import of the words of the clause. Hanna and Carbou precincts are located in coal-mining towns along the railroad mentioned. We are not unmindful of the fact that, as reported by one of the newspapers published at the time at the capital of the territory, public meetings were held in that city, previous to the vote of the people upon the question of the adoption of the Constitution, which were addressed by prominent men, and that it was publicly stated by two gentlemen, one of whom had been a member of the convention, that, as to the educational qualification, a reading in English was not required. I have no doubt whatever of the honesty of those statements; and, if it were possible to attribute any ambiguity to the words providing such qualification, such statements publicly made would be strongly persuasive; nor has it escaped our attention that, so far as public knowledge is concerned, at the elections in 1892 and 1894, and likewise in 1896, except at Hanna and Carbon precincts, the question of the disqualification of the citizens who could only read a translation of the Constitution was not raised. I am inclined to consider it as a matter of common knowledge that such persons were, without objection, allowed to vote at the elections mentioned. Nevertheless, that practice has not been indulged in for such a length of time as to give it a controlling effect in the interpretation of what must be regarded as an unambiguous constitutional mandate. Chicago v. McCoy, 136 Ill. 844, 11 L. R. A. 413. For the reason that, at least, a majority of the court had felt strongly persuaded by the extraneous circumstances which seemed to point to a contrary understanding, our conclusion has been reached with some reluctance; but we perceive no possible escape from it. We cannot avoid the clear import and significance of the language of the Constitution. Upon greater deliberation, moreover, it has become apparent that, from the circumstances referred to, there is not a clear indication of such contrary understanding having been general. Whatever the actual purpose was, even if there existed at that time a misconception of the provision, it must bow to the supremacy of the words themselves. They constitute the only safe and reliable index of the intent and purposes of the convention and the people. In view of the probability that any express mention of the English language was purposely avoided by some person or persons in framing the provision for an educational qualification, we are not surprised that there has existed an honest difference of opinion relative to its scope and effect, and that it has been the subject of inaccurate and loose interpretation. That any broader construction than that which the court has placed upon it is loose and inaccurate, we are convinced, and are therefore constrained to hold that, in the sense of the constitutional requirement, no person is able to read the Constitution of this state who cannot read it in the English language, and consequently is not entitled to vote, unless such incapacity is the result of physical disability, or such person had the right to vote at the time of the adoption of the Constitution.

The decision of the court upon questions 1 and 6 is that the 54 and 50 votes, respectively, making a total of 104 votes mentioned in paragraphs 5 and 10 of the statement of facts, were not legal votes. In view of this conclusion, it is not apparent from an inspection of 38 L. R. A.

the papers in the case that a decision upon the questions regarding the votes mentioned in the other paragraphs of the statement is at all essential to a determination of the cause. We should therefore refrain from responding to such questions. Respecting the number of votes to be deducted from the number counted, returned, and abstracted for the defendant, that becomes a mere matter of calculation, and, not being involved in any difficulty, hardly requires direction or advice from this court. The fourteenth question is: "What judgment should be rendered in this action?" The statute authorizes questions, not cases, to be certified to this court for its decision. It may be said, not improperly perhaps, that the case is certified for the decision of the supreme court upon certain important and difficult questions; but, in the strict sense, the case itself is not brought before us for determination. It is here temporarily awaiting a decision upon the reserved questions. The papers must be here to disclose the fact that the reserved questions are actually involved. In our opinion, the 14th question is not a proper one for reservation.

Conaway, Ch. J., concurs.

Corn, J.:

I concur in the conclusion reached, and very largely in the views expressed in the opinion of the court. The Constitution (art. 6, § 9) provides that "no person shall have the right to vote who shall not be able to read the Constitution of this state. The provisions of this section shall not apply to any person prevented by physical disability from complying with its requirements." The first and most important question presented is whether certain foreign-born citizens residing at Carbon and Hanna (coal-mining towns in Carbon county), who were not voters in Wyoming at the time of the adoption of the Constitution, and who at the time of the election of 1896 were not able to read the Constitution of the state of Wyoming in English, but who could read a proper translation or interpretation of such Constitution in the Finnish language, are precluded by the provisions of this section from the right of suffrage. The rule uniformly laid down by the courts and text-writers in interpreting statutes and Constitutions is that resort must first be had to the language itself. Sutherland says: "It is beyond question the duty of courts in construing statutes to give effect to the intent of the lawmaking power, and seek for that intent in every legitimate way. But . . . first of all in the words and language employed; and if the words are free from ambiguity and doubt, and express plainly, clearly, and distinctly the sense of the framers of the instrument, there is no occasion to resort to other means of interpretation. It is not allowable to interpret what has no need of interpretation." The statute itself furnishes the best means of its own exposition; and if the sense in which words were intended to be used can be clearly ascertained from its parts and provisions, the intention thus indicated will prevail, without resorting to other means of aiding in the construction." Sutherland, Stat. Constr. § 237. He says, further: And "one who contends that a section of an act must not be read literally must be able to show one of two things; either that there is some other section which cuts down or expands its meaning, or else that the section itself is repugnant to the general purview." Id. § 238. That which the words declare is the meaning of the instrument, and neither courts nor legislatures have a right to add to or take away from that meaning. Cooley, Const. Lim. 70.

The plaintiff contends that, to qualify a citizen for the suffrage in this state, he must be able to read the Constitution of the state in the English language; while, upon the other hand, it is contended by the defendant that the citizens in question, though unable to read the Constitution in English, are yet qualified voters, being able to read a translation or interpretation of it in the Finnish language. Considering the question in the light of the principle and according to the rule above stated, if the language were simply that the voter must be able to "read," without specifying the particular language or the particular instrument to be read, the meaning might be deemed less clear. Yet even in cases where an act is required to be done, and the language to be employed is not specified, it has been uniformly held, so far as I have been able to find, that, where the judicial language of the state is English, that language is intended, and must be employed. In Texas, where one of the qualifications of jurors was the ability to read and write without specifying any language, it was held that the English was intended, and that a citizen was disqualified as a jurymen unless he was able to read and write English. Nolen v. State, 9 Tex. App. 423; Garcia v. State, 12 Tex. App. 339. In Pennsylvania, where publication of a notice "in a newspaper" was required, not specifying the language to be used, it was held that English was intended, and that publication in a German newspaper was not a compliance with the law, although German was largely used in the particular locality; and the court, in the same opinion, referred to the propriety and necessity of a proper statute authorizing a publication in German. Road in Upper Hanover, 44 Pa. 277. In New Jersey, where a statute directed publication in a newspaper, without specifying in what language, the court held that it must be in English, the ordinary language of the state. State, City Publishing Co., v. Jersey City, 54 N. J. L. 437. And the same point was again decided in the same way in State, Wilson, v. Trenton, 56 N. J. L. 469. In Wisconsin, where the language in which the required publication should be made was not specified, it was held that, if the publication was made in English, a city council might also authorize a publication in a German newspaper. Kellogg, v. Oakkosh, 14 Wis. 624. Indeed, I have found no case where the question has arisen that it has not been decided, either expressly or by implication, that where no language is named, the English, the language of the country, is intended.

But the requirement of the Constitution is much more than that the voter shall simply be able to read. It is that he shall be able to read a particular instrument,—"the Constitution of this state." These additional words cannot be treated as mere surplusage, and rejected from our consideration. They have some meaning, and, interpreting them, the question immediately and necessarily arises: What is the Constitution of Wyoming, which this clause requires the citizen to be able to read to qualify him for suffrage? The answer is drawn from the common knowledge of the people, and which courts and juries are supposed to possess, and must apply in reaching their decisions. It is an instrument written and adopted in the English language, the judicial language of the state. The requirement is not that the voter shall have studied or shall understand and comprehend the contents or substance of it, but that he shall be able to read the specific instrument. He must have that much and that character of education. To construe a reading in any other language than the English to be sufficient, something must be added to the section, so that it would read, in substance: "No person shall have the right to vote who shall not be able to read the Constitution of this state, or a translation thereof." It needs no argument to establish that a translation is not identical with the original. No matter how similar it may be in meaning, it is plain it cannot be identical. It is not the instrument, but a translation or interpretation of the instrument. A copy of a Finnish, Russian, or German translation would not be a copy of the Constitution, and the officer would be rash who would certify it as such. Cooley says, "In interpreting clauses, we must presume the words have been employed in their natural and ordinary meaning;" and he quotes the language of Chief Justice Marshall that the framers of the Constitution and the people who adopted it "must be understood to have employed words in their natural sense, and to have intended what they have said." Applying this rule, and neither adding to nor taking away from that meaning, it cannot be said that one who is able only to read a translation of the instrument fills the requirement of this provision, that he must be able to read the instrument.

The argument might, if necessary, be much extended. Not only is a translation not identical in the sense of being the same in words, but it is uniformly recognized that it is not precisely similar in meaning, and, in the nature of things, in any extended composition, cannot be. Many English words have no precise equivalent in other languages, for the reason that the ideas expressed by them are not familiar to the people who speak those languages. It is plain that a people having no knowledge of the steam engine would have no word to express or describe it. And it is equally clear, I think, that, civil liberty as it exists in the states of America being unknown to the subjects of a despotic government, they could, in the nature of things, have no word or phrase in their language to describe or define it; and the very word "Constitution," when translated into their language, would, of necessity, convey the idea of a grant or concession from the ruler, rather than the idea of an instrument declaring the organic law, made by the people themselves, and binding upon the people and their rulers alike. So that to hold that the ability to read a translation in such cases would meet the requirements of the section would necessitate a still greater alteration in its words, so that the section would then in substance read: "No person shall have a right to vote who shall not be able to read the Constitution of this state, or a translation of so much thereof as is capable of being translated into such person's own language." This is not only the reasonable view, but the one supported by authority. In the case of State, North Orange Baptist Church, v. Orange, 54 N. J. L. 112, 14 L. R. A. 62, the charter of the city required that public notice of a contemplated improvement should be given by publishing a copy of the proposed ordinance, and that the said notice should state the time and place of the meeting of the council to consider the said ordinance. The charter also provided that these notices should be published in all three of the newspapers of the city, one of which was published in the German language. The court held that the notice published in the German newspaper must be in the German language, as otherwise it would not be "published," but only "printed," but that the copy of the ordinance required to be inserted in the notice in such German paper must be in the English language. The court further says: "Again, the charter requires all ordinances, after their passage, to be published in the same three papers. This ordinance was published in a German translation only. I think this was also a mistake. There is a manifest distinction to be observed between the publication of a notice and the publication of an instrument or statute or ordinance. A notice requires no particular collocation of words so long as it conveys a clear notion of its subject. But a statute or ordinance has no legal existence except in the language in which it is passed. No translation, however accurate, can be adopted in the place of its original text for the purposes of construction in a legal proceeding. Until the legislature makes a provision for the printing of ordinances in German newspapers in translation, it is not perceived how they can be printed otherwise than litera et verba. The publication of the translation may be regarded as a proper explanatory adjunct of the English copy, but cannot be accepted as a legal substitute for it. This view of the manner in which an ordinance should be printed under these conditions applies in some degree to the notice also. As already set forth, the charter requires that as part of such notice a copy of the proposed ordinance shall be published. For the reasons already stated, this copy should appear in English. The ordinance must be set aside." This language cannot be misunderstood. The court distinctly hold that such an instrument "has no legal existence except in the language in which it is passed;" that a translation "cannot be accepted as a legal substitute for it." In Stowe v. Thomas, 2 Wall. Jr. 547, Uncle Tom's Cabin had been translated into German by the author, and the translation secured by copyright. The defendant made a second translation into German, published it in a Philadelphia newspaper, and was proceeding to secure such second translation by copyright. It was held that such second translation was not an infringement of the copyright of the original, nor, being an independent translation, of the copyright of the first translation. And the court says: "Its identity does not consist merely in the ideas, knowledge, or information communicated, but in the same conceptions clothed in the same words, which make it the same composition. A 'copy' of a book must, therefore, be a transcript of the language in which the conceptions of the author are clothed; of something printed and embodied in a tangible shape. The same conceptions clothed in another language cannot constitute the same composition, nor can it be called a transcript or 'copy' of the same 'book.'" Id. 565.

The reasoning of these cases applies with full force to what is called the "Constitution," under our system of government. It is true that, in a general sense, a Constitution may be defined as a "fundamental law or basis of government," and, as in the case of the English Constitution, may be unwritten. But that is not the American sense. Judge Cooley says: "In American constitutional law, the word 'Constitution' is used in a restricted sense, as implying the written instrument agreed upon by the people of the Union, or of any one of the states, etc." Const. Lim. 3. Neither is this a mere technical sense of the word. It is the technical and it is the popular sense. It is the only correct, legal sense, in its context. The requirement being the ability to read, the necessary inference is that it is a written instrument.

But it is urged with great earnestness that the section must be strictly construed; that no language being mentioned, and the term to "read" being applicable to a reading in any language, it cannot be restricted to a reading in the English. It is said, "He must be unable to read the Constitution at all, to come within the strict meaning of § 9;" that is to say, if, by any possible interpretation of the words, he can be said to be able to read the Constitution, he is not excluded from the suffrage by its terms. This is not a proper application of the rule of strict construction. The court in United States v. Wiltberger, 18 U. S. 5 Wheat. 95, 5 L. ed. 42, says: "It is said, that notwithstanding this rule, the intention of the lawmaker must govern. . . . This is true. But this is not a new independent rule, which subverts the old. It is a modification of the ancient maxim, and amounts to this, that though penal laws are to be construed strictly, they are not to be construed so strictly as to defeat the obvious intention of the legislature. The maxim is not to be so applied as to narrow the words of the statute to the exclusion of cases, which those words, in their ordinary acceptance, or in that sense in which the legislature has obviously used them, would comprehend." And in the English case of Nicholson v. Fields, 31 L. J. Exch. N. S. 235, it is said: "I . . . admit that though the common distinction taken between penal acts and remedial acts, that the former are to be construed strictly, the others are to be construed liberally, is not a distinction, perhaps, that ought to be erased from the mind of a judge, yet I think that we ought always to look, whatever be the act, be it penal or be it remedial, for the true construction of the act by its language, and in that respect that there ought to be no distinction between a penal statute and a remedial statute." The intention of the convention and the people is to be collected from the words they employ. They have used words of definite meaning, legally and commonly well understood. They must be accepted in that sense by the court. No distinction of a strict or liberal construction is involved. If, however, having ascertained the correct meaning of the words in their context, it were reasonably doubtful whether the persons referred to are included, the rule of strict construction would be applied, and they would be excluded from the operation of the section. No such doubt arises in this case, but they are obviously included within the words as interpreted, and have not the right of suffrage under the Constitution.

In my opinion, the circumstances do not arise which would authorize the court to interpret the section otherwise than by the natural and ordinary meaning of the words themselves; for it cannot be shown, as required by the rule as stated by Sutherland, before it can be read other than literally, "either that there is some other section which cuts down or expands the meaning, or that the section itself is repugnant to the general purview." But, if it were deemed necessary or permissible to resort to other sources of information to aid in the construction, this view is rather strengthened than otherwise. At the same time, there is one suggestion which seems to be, in some measure, at least, persuasive of a different view; and that is that this section is modeled upon a similar one in the Massachusetts Constitution, where the requirement is the ability "to read the Constitution in the English language." And it is forcibly urged that the omission of the words "in the English language" proves the intention of the convention to dispense with that requirement. But it is evident, in the first place, that the rule that statutes originally enacted in another state, when adopted, are deemed to be taken with the settled construction given them in the state from which they are copied, has no application; for the converse of the proposition is simply a negative, that, not having copied the original statute, we do not adopt its construction. But the argument is that the changed phraseology indicates a change of substance and intent. It is clear that a change of the phraseology of an older statute of the same state by a revision presents a much stronger case than this, and, in discussing that subject, Sutherland says: "The presumption of a change of intention from a change of language is of no great weight, and must mainly depend on the intrinsic difference as resulting from the modification. A mere change in the words of a revision will not be deemed a change in the law unless it appears that such was the intention. The intent to change the law must be evident and certain; there must be such substantial change as to import such intention, or it must otherwise be manifest from other guides of interpretation, or the difference of phraseology will not be deemed expressive of a different intention." Stat. Constr. § 256. And in this case the omission does not of itself furnish an interpretation of the words as they now stand; and, to give it the greatest weight that could reasonably be claimed for it, the only effect would be to send the court upon a search through the journals of the convention to ascertain what the motives of the convention were in making the change of language. This we are not permitted to do when the words themselves are unambiguous, as they are in this case. But, if we should do so, other facts appear which must outweigh the one named. The section was introduced in its present form and no mention is anywhere made that it was taken from the Constitution of Massachusetts; and the fact that that Constitution contains the words "in the English language" is only once mentioned in the debates. The provision was debated at great length, and by a large number of the members, and the section as it now stands was under fire during the entire discussion. And while, by the well-settled rules of construction, we would not in any contingency be permitted to recur to the views of individual members, yet it is easily ascertainable from the debates what the general purpose of the convention was. Without any question, it was to deny suffrage to a class of foreign birth, who congregated in large numbers in the mining towns, and who, it was claimed, were unfamiliar with our institutions, were unable to vote intelligently, and were and would be voting at the dictation of others. This class was designated again and again. At the same time there was expressed in unmistakable terms the greatest disinclination to disfranchise citizens of the United States, whether of native or foreign birth, who were attached to our institutions, acquainted with public affairs, and able to vote intelligently, but who, by defect of early education, were unable to read; and the determination not to disfranchise any of the latter, except so far as it might be unavoidable in carrying out the purposes of the convention, was repeatedly expressed, and was clearly shown in the adoption of § 10 of the same article. There can be no question of the identity of the class intended to be reached with those whose right of suffrage is involved in this case. Of the wisdom or justice of the measure this court is not empowered to judge; but it would be a strange and surprising result if the very class whom the convention purposed to exclude should be adjudged entitled to suffrage, while others native to the country, or thoroughly Americanized by long residence and familiarity with our institutions, and whom the convention desired to exempt as far as possible from the operation of the provision, should be disfranchised. I am therefore of the opinion that the meaning of the words themselves is clear, and there is no occasion to resort to external aids in their construction; and that, if the debates should be resorted to, it would further appear that the words, as interpreted, express the true intent of the convention and the people. I also concur in the opinion that, an answer to the remaining questions submitted not being necessary to a decision of these cases, they ought not at this time to be considered.

PENNSYLVANIA SUPREME COURT.

Wilson W. JAGGER, Appt.,

v.

PEOPLE'S STREET RAILWAY COMPANY et al.

(180 Pa. 436.)

Jumping from an electric car moving at the rate of from 4 to 5 miles an hour is contributory negligence as matter of law.

(March 22, 1897.)

APPeal by plaintiff from a judgment of the Court of Common Pleas for Lackawanna County in favor of defendants in an action brought to recover damages for personal injuries alleged to have been caused by defendant's negligence. Affirmed.

The case sufficiently appears in the opinion.

NOTE.—Negligence in getting on or off a moving street car.

The question of how far it is negligence to get onto or off from a moving street car will generally arise in actions against the street-car companies to recover damages for injuries received while making the attempt. A number of decisions have been rendered against the plaintiffs in such cases, not because they were guilty of contributory negligence, but because no negligence on the part of the carrier was shown, which was necessary to support a recovery.

Carrier must have been negligent.

There may be circumstances under which a person alights from a moving car and is injured when the question of contributory negligence cannot arise because there has been no negligence on the part of the street-car company which would render it liable. For instance, if the passenger signals for a stop and while the car is slowing down for that purpose, without waiting for it to come to a stop, he steps off, falls, and is injured, there has been no negligence on the part of the carrier which would render it liable, and the question of his contributory negligence cannot be considered. Harmon v. Washington G. R. Co. 6 Mackey, 64.

If there was no negligence on the part of the carrier there can be no recovery, although the act of the plaintiff may not have been negligent. Hestonville Pass. R. Co. v. Connell, 88 Pa. 520, 32 Am. Rep. 472; Sandford v. Hestonville, M. & F. Pass. R. Co. 186 Pa. 84; Clutzbeher v. Union Pass. R. Co. (Pa.) 1 Cent. Rep. 629; Coller v. Frankford & S. R. Co. 9 W. N. C. 477; West Chicago Street R. Co. v. Binder, 51 Ill. App. 420; Dallas Consol. Traction R. Co. v. Randolph, 8 Tex. Civ. App. 213.

In Nichols v. Middlesex R. Co. 106 Mass. 463, the injury occurred by the sudden starting of the car, and the case turned, not on the question of whether or not the attempt to get on the car while it was in motion was negligence, but upon the question whether or not those in charge of the car knew of the attempt so as to be chargeable with negligence in starting the car forward when they did.

Passenger takes the risk.

If a person undertakes to board or to alight from a moving car he takes the risk of injury which ordinarily attends such action.

In the absence of negligence on the part of the carrier the person who steps off the moving car will take the risk of injury. White v. West End Street R. Co. 166 Mass. 622.

So, a person attempts to get onto a moving street car at his own risk. Picard v. Ridge Ave. Pass. R. Co. 147 Pa. 196.

A passenger who voluntarily jumps onto or off from a moving car does so at his own peril and cannot recover for an injury thereby received on the ground that the construction of the car was defective, if the car would have been safe for ordinary use. Werbowsky v. Fort Wayne & E. R. Co. 86 Mich. 286.

A person who attempts to get upon a horse car while it is in motion, and who persists after he is told to wait until the car stops, cannot recover for an injury caused by running against a person on the step of the car. Gallagher v. West End Street R. Co. 156 Mass. 187.

If the attempt to get onto the moving car is the sole cause of the injury there can be no recovery. Thrings v. Central Park R. Co. 7 Robt. 616.

If an injury is caused by a person's attempting to get off a car in motion, and being thrown against an obstruction in the highway by the momentum of the car, he cannot recover. Saffer v. Dry Dock, E. B. & B. R. Co. 2 Blv. Sup. Ct. 343.

The mere refusal of the carrier to stop the car will not authorize the passenger to attempt to get off from it while it is in motion so as to charge the carrier with liability for the result of the attempt. Ginnon v. New York & H. R. Co. 3 Robt. 25.

A person forty-two years old and weighing 210 pounds who attempts to board a street car moving 6 miles an hour with a basket in one hand and a bottle in the other must bear the consequences of an injury which results from the failure of his attempt. Baltimore Traction Co. v. State, King-sold, 78 Md. 409.

But it has been held that a person attempting to get on an electric street-railway car while it is in motion assumes the risk of injury only from the ordinary movement of the car. Schepers v. Union Depot R. Co. 126 Mo. 665.

How far negligence a question of law.

Where the carrier has been negligent so that the passenger will have a right to recover in case he was himself free from negligence, the question how far his act was negligent immediately arises. And the further question then arises whether the judge or the jury shall give the answer. As a general rule it may be stated that the question is for the jury. But in some cases it may be determined as matter of law.

Thus, it is negligence to attempt to board a street car while it is in rapid motion. Chicago City R. Co. v. Delcourt, 38 Ill. App. 430.

So, it is gross negligence in a passenger to jump from a car which is going at the rate of 20 miles an hour, whether or not he knows that the speed is so high. Masteron v. Macon City & S. Street R. Co. 88 Ga. 436.

So, it is negligence for a person to board a cable car running at the rate of 10 miles an hour without signaling the car to stop on the side next the other track upon which another car is approaching at the same speed but a short distance away. Brooks v. Mt. Auburn Cable Co. 29 Ohio L. J. 50.

So, stepping from a cable car going at the rate of 11 miles an hour is gross negligence. Denver Tramway Co. v. Owens, 20 Colo. 107.

It is presumptively negligent to attempt to board a street car which is running at its ordinary rate of speed or at accelerated speed, or to attempt to get on the platform or between cars. Sahlgard v. St. Paul City R. Co. 48 Minn. 223.

If the rate of speed is so high and the place of

Mr. Charles L. Hawley, for appellant:

The defendants, having on many previous occasions slowed the speed of the car so uniformly that the plaintiff had many times alighted therefrom without injury, where under an obligation to the plaintiff to do so on the occasion of the accident. The sudden putting on of the power was negligence in this case.

Linch v. Pittsburgh Traction Co. 153 Pa. 102.

dercent so obviously perilous that a person of ordinary prudence would not attempt to get off, the act is contributory negligence and will bar a recovery. So if the passenger steps from a rapidly moving train on to the other track without looking to see if a train is coming on it he will be guilty of such negligence as to bar his recovery for injury by a train on the other track. Weber v. Kansas City Cable R. Co. 100 Mo. 194, 7 L. R. A. 819.

Getting off a car in rapid motion is negligence. Saffer v. Dry Dock, R. B. & B. R. Co. 2 Silv. Sup. Ct. 343.

A person injured by attempting to board an electric car when it is running at full speed cannot recover from the carrier for the injury. Woo Dan v. Seattle Electric R. & Power Co. 5 Wash. 465.

In Ricketts v. Birmingham Street R. Co. 85 Ala. 606, the court says there can be no question that the plaintiff was guilty of negligence which proximately contributed to his injury, if while the car was in motion he attempted to step off with a keg of lead in his hands, and would not have been injured had he remained on the car. It is further said that stepping from a moving car without necessity when injury is caused thereby which would have been avoided by remaining on the car is negligence which will defeat a recovery. And that ruling was followed in McDonald v. Montgomery Street R. Co. 110 Ala. 161.

But in cases where the speed was not great, and no other circumstances making negligence plainly apparent were present, the court refuses to decide the question as one of law.

It would be impossible for a court to lay down the rule as to what particular speed would be sufficient notice to a passenger that if he attempted to get on or off he would be guilty of contributory negligence. Cicero & P. Street R. Co. v. Meixner, 160 Ill. 320, 81 L. R. A. 381.

It cannot be announced as a legal principle that a passenger upon a street railway car may not get off the car when it is in motion. Brown v. Seattle City R. Co. 16 Wash. 465.

The mere fact that a car is moving slowly when a man attempts to get onto it does not make him guilty of negligence as matter of law, but the question is for the jury. Morrison v. Broadway & S. Ave. R. Co. 130 N. Y. 166, Affirming 23 N. Y. S. R. 493.

It is not under all circumstances negligence, as matter of law, for a person to get upon a street car while it is in motion. In exceptional cases it may be so, but ordinarily it is a question for the jury. Eppendorf v. Brooklyn City & N. R. Co. 69 N. Y. 195, 23 Am. Rep. 171.

It is not negligence, as matter of law, to step on or off from a moving street car. Omaha Street R. Co. v. Craig, 39 Neb. 601.

In McSwyny v. Broadway & S. Ave. R. Co. 27 N. Y. S. R. 363, the court charged that if the plaintiff had attempted to enter the car while it was in motion she could not recover, and the appellate court held that this was as favorable to defendant as it could demand, because it was settled that it was not, as matter of law, always negligent to pass upon a street car while it is in motion.

In Schacherl v. St. Paul City R. Co. 42 Minn. 42, the court while recognizing the general rule says that the conditions attending the act might, from the undisputed testimony, appear so unfavorable as to warrant the court in holding, as matter of law, that recklessness and negligence were apparent in the attempt.

In Hagan v. Philadelphia & G. Ferry R. Co. 15 Phila. 273, it was held that it was contributory negligence, as a matter of law, for a person to leap from a moving horse car. But there was nothing to show negligence on the part of the carrier in the case except the fact that the car was not stopped when the signal was given so that the ruling could have been placed on the ground that there was nothing to charge the carrier with negligence, and the ruling as to contributory negligence was unnecessary.

And in Nichols v. Sixth Ave. R. Co. 38 N. Y. 131, 97 Am. Dec. 780, it is said that a passenger has no right to jump from a street car while it is in motion.

It is not negligence in law to get on to a slowly moving street car. Valentine v. Broadway & S. Ave. R. Co. 14 Daly, 540; Seitz v. Dry Dock, R. B. & B. R. Co. 16 Daly, 234; Eppendorf v. Brooklyn City & N. R. Co. 51 How. Pr. 473.

How far act is due care as matter of law.

There are a few expressions in some of the cases which would tend to imply that a person getting off from or onto a moving car might be exercising due care as matter of law.

If when the passenger attempts to step off from the car it is barely moving, his attempt will not constitute such negligence as will prevent his recovery for an injury caused by a sudden jerk of the car which throws him to the ground. Chicago City R. Co. v. Mumford, 97 Ill. 560.

If a person has free use of his faculties and limbs, and has given proper notice of his desire to be taken up, and the car has slackened speed in the usual manner, it is not negligence for him to attempt to get on when it is slowly moving. Conner v. Citizens Street R. Co. 105 Ind. 63, 55 Am. Rep. 177.

It would be a hard rule to hold a passenger guilty of contributory negligence in attempting to board a street car moving so slowly that there would be no apparent danger whatever in the attempt—so slowly that a person of reasonable prudence in the exercise of ordinary care would not hesitate to make the effort. Stager v. Ridge Ave. Pass. R. Co. 119 Pa. 70.

If the intending passenger has a right to think from the condition of the car that it is about to stop he has a right to get on. Walters v. Philadelphia Traction Co. 161 Pa. 86.

How far the courts in the above cases intended to decide that the person was exercising due care as matter of law is somewhat uncertain. The question would probably involve the further question of proximate cause so that if the court decided it, the decision would simply be that the act of the passenger did not cause or contribute to the injury. So far as the act was one of negligence simply it would seem to be properly within the province of the jury.

As matter of law the act of getting on a moving street car is colorless. It is for the jury to say whether the passenger is guilty of negligence or was in the exercise of due care. Gilbert v. Third Ave. R. Co. 22 Jones & S. 270.

Although it may not be negligence as matter of law to leave a street car in motion, yet it is not evidence of due care. So, where a person receives injury by stepping from a moving car immediately in front of another car coming from an opposite direction no recovery can be had for the injury. Creamer v. West End Street R. Co. 156 Mass. 330, 18 L. R. A. 490.

A passenger's leaving a slowly moving street car is not per se negligence.

ters, 80 Ind. 168; St. Louis, I. M. & S. R. Co. v. Cantrell, 37 Ark. 519, 40 Am. Rep. 105; Cumberland Valley R. Co. v. Maugans, 61 Md. 58, 48 Am. Rep. 88; Edgar v. Northern R. Co.

If the passenger has proceeded so far toward getting off before the car stops that he cannot retrace his steps, he will not be negligent in getting off after the car has started. Piper v. Minneapolis Street R. Co. 52 Minn. 269.

To get on or off a moving street car is not necessarily negligence. West Chicago Street R. Co. v. Dudzik, 87 Ill. App. 681.

It is not negligence for a man twenty-six years old, in good health and unencumbered, to attempt to board a slowly moving car, but in case he does so and is injured by coming in contact with a truck standing in the street before he gets safely inside, he cannot recover for the injury for the reason that the injury is due to his own act as much as to the act of the carrier, and there is no ground for recovery. Moylan v. Second Ave. R. Co. 128 N. Y. 583, Reversing 85 N. Y. S. R. 644.

Question for jury.

In the majority of cases it will be a question for the jury to determine whether or not the injured person was negligent. North Chicago Street R. Co. v. Wrixon, 51 Ill. App. 307; Sahlgard v. St. Paul City R. Co. 48 Minn. 222; Omaha Street R. Co. v. Martin, 48 Neb. 66; Munroe v. Third Ave. R. Co. 18 Jones & S. 114; Lynch v. Pittsburgh Traction Co. 163 Pa. 102.

If the person is in physical vigor and free from any hindrance the question of negligence is one of fact for the jury. Finkeldey v. Omnibus Cable Co. 114 Cal. 28.

To board or depart from an electric street car in motion is not negligence per se, but the question is for the jury. Cicero & P. Street R. Co. v. Melxner, 160 Ill. 320, 51 L. R. A. 381.

The question of negligence in getting into a horse car while it is in motion is for the jury. North Chicago Street R. Co. v. Williams, 140 Ill. 275, Affirming 40 Ill. App. 590, where it is said that the getting on the cars while they were in motion had nothing to do with the accident.

The court will not be authorized to take the case from the jury unless the act as proved by undisputed testimony is seen to be such that the common judgment of men might pronounce it to be negligence. McDonough v. Metropolitan R. Co. 187 Mass. 210.

Where a man sixty-eight years old and weighing nearly 200 pounds attempted to get on to a car going about 4 miles an hour, after signaling the driver to stop, and fell off and was injured, it was held a question for the jury whether or not he was negligent. Briggs v. Union Street R. Co. 143 Mass. 72.

If the car had motion when the passenger attempted to get off, the question of negligence will be for the jury unless the testimony uncontroversially shows that it was dangerous motion. Lax v. Forty-Second & G. Street Ferry R. Co. 14 Jones & S. 443.

If a person gets upon the wrong side of the car, and is brought into collision with a pole supporting the trolley wires which is located between the tracks, the question is for the jury whether or not he was negligent in making the attempt, under all the circumstances of the case, to get upon the car when it was moving slowly and he had no knowledge of the existence of the poles. Kowalski v. Newark Pass. R. Co. 15 N. J. L. J. 50.

In Van de Venter v. Chicago City R. Co. 26 Fed. Rep. 82, the court charged the jury that if the plaintiff's injury was caused by her own want of prudence or care in attempting to take the car while it was in motion she could not recover. 88 L. R. A.

Negligence dependent on circumstances.

Whether a person in boarding a moving street car is guilty of negligence must depend upon the circumstances of each particular case. And it cannot be said to be negligence per se unless the act be such that under the circumstances but one conclusion can be arrived at, that of negligence. Citizens' Street R. Co. v. Spahr, 7 Ind. App. 23.

The question of negligence or not depends upon the circumstances of each particular case, as, the speed of the car, the activity or infirmity of the person and the like, and is for the jury. Ober v. Crescent City R. Co. 44 La. Ann. 1059.

The act of attempting to board a street car in motion is not of itself negligence as matter of law, but whether such act is negligent must depend upon the particular circumstances upon which it is done. Finkeldey v. Omnibus Cable Co. 114 Cal. 28. The court says it is a matter of common observation that persons do every day get on and off from street cars while they are in motion under circumstances that would not, in the estimation of any reasonable man, be considered negligence.

Particular classes of cases.

If the passenger is at the time of his attempt to leave the car suffering from a wound in his leg which causes lameness or disability, the jury may infer a want of ordinary prudence from an attempt to leave the car under the circumstances. Wyatt v. Citizens R. Co. 63 Mo. 408.

Whether or not it is negligence to step off a moving car, encumbered with bundles, is a question of fact for the jury, depending upon the speed of the car and the circumstances under which the attempt is made. Richmond v. Second Ave. R. Co. 76 Hun. 238.

It is contributory negligence to attempt to board a car with one hand and arm encumbered. Reddington v. Philadelphia Traction Co. 132 Pa. 154.

It is not negligence per se for a person with an umbrella in one hand and a handkerchief in the other to attempt to board an electric street car while it is in the act of stopping to receive passengers. White v. Atlanta Consol. Street R. Co. 93 Ga. 494.

In Kirchner v. Detroit City R. Co. 81 Mich. 400, where the plaintiff recovered, the court charged the jury that if the plaintiff with a large package in his hands attempted to leave the car before it had stopped it would be an act of negligence which would prevent his recovery. But as the suit was brought for starting the car with a jerk and throwing the plaintiff before he had time to alight, the finding of the jury in his favor evidently left the question of contributory negligence out of the case.

Stepping off backwards.

It is negligence to step off backwards from a moving car unless the act is induced by the negligent conduct of the carrier. Richmond v. Second Ave. R. Co. 76 Hun. 238.

It is negligence as matter of law to step from a moving car with the face to the rear and retain a hold on the car in such a way that the forward motion of the car will naturally tend to pull the person off his feet. Beattie v. Citizens' Pass. R. Co. (Pa.) 1 Cent. Rep. 633.

A person who attempts to alight from a rapidly moving electric car with his back to the poles supporting the wires which he knows are there will be held to have been the cause of his own injury in case he comes in contact with one of the poles.

while making his attempt. State, Sharkey, v. Lake Roland Elev. R. Co. 84 Md. 163.

Women.

In some cases it has been held to be negligence, as matter of law, for a woman to attempt to get on or off a moving train. But there is a difference of opinion upon this question.

A woman is guilty of contributory negligence in attempting to get off from a street car while it is in motion in violation of the rules of the company without anything being done by the employees of the company to cause her to take the step. Calderwood v. North Birmingham Street R. Co. 96 Ala. 313.

In Wheaton v. North Beach & M. R. Co. 36 Cal. 590, the court says that if the car had started before the plaintiff had commenced to descend she was negligent in not telling the conductor that she wished to get out and in not waiting until he had stopped the car before attempting to do so.

In Central R. Co. v. Smith, 74 Md. 212, it was assumed that it would be negligence for a woman to attempt to leave a car in motion. The court giving an instruction that plaintiff could not recover if there was any failure on her part to exercise ordinary care as by attempting to leave the car while in motion.

In Olfemann v. Union Depot R. Co. 126 Mo. 408, which was a suit by an elderly woman to recover for injuries received in falling from an electric car, the court says that the trial court might well have told the jury that if the plaintiff after getting on the car platform in a place of safety and after the train had started turned around and jumped off and thereby received the injury of which she complained then she could not recover.

But in other cases it has been held that the mere fact that a car is moving slightly when a lady attempts to get off will not prevent her recovery for an injury which was not caused by her attempt at that time. Rathbone v. Union R. Co. 13 R. I. 709.

It is not negligence as matter of law, regardless of the circumstances, for a woman to alight from a moving car. Duncan v. Wyatt Park R. Co. 48 Mo. App. 660.

It is not negligence as matter of law for a woman to attempt to alight from a moving car. Conley v. Forty-Second Street, M. & St. N. Ave. R. Co. 2 N. Y. Supp. 229.

Whether or not the act of a woman in stepping from a slowly moving street car is negligence is a question for the jury under all the circumstances of the case. Fortune v. Missouri R. Co. 10 Mo. App. 253.

Children.

In Brennan v. Fair Haven & W. R. Co. 45 Conn. 298, 29 Am. Rep. 679, it was held that a special duty devolved upon those in charge of the car to see that a ten-year-old boy obeyed the rule of the company not to attempt to get off the car while it was in motion.

In Pittsburgh, A. & M. Pass. R. Co. v. Caldwell, 74 Pa. 421, it was held that a child five years old could not be held to be guilty of negligence in attempting to get off from a street car while in motion, and that it was negligence on the part of the driver to permit it to do so.

But it was held that a boy eleven years old who without signifying his desire to get off goes to the front platform and steps off with his back toward the horses while the car is in motion cannot recover. 88 L. R. A.

In North Birmingham R. Co. v. Liddicoat, 90 Ala. 545, where a boy was injured in attempting to board a dummy train, the court says: "It cannot be affirmed as a universal proposition of law that it is negligence per se for a person to attempt to board a moving train. The age and physical condition of the person making the attempt, the rate of speed of the train, the nature of the car and of the place, and all the attendant facts and circumstances enter into the question; and while any one of these facts might possibly be sufficient to justify the conclusion of negligence as matter of law, ordinarily it is a question for the jury, the test being whether a person of ordinary care and prudence would, under similar circumstances, have made the attempt."

A street-car company cannot be held liable for the death of a boy seventeen years old who jumped on the front platform of the car, seized the driver's whip and whips the mules, jumping off and on and urging the mules to go faster, until by a misstep he falls and is caught by the car wheel and killed. Taylor v. South Covington & C. Street R. Co. 14 Ky. L. Rep. 355.

It is a question for the jury whether or not it was negligence for a boy seventeen years old of sound mind to step from a street car in rapid motion. Wyatt v. Citizens Street R. Co. 55 Mo. 486.

Whether a boy fourteen years of age is guilty of negligence in attempting as a passenger to get upon a moving street car will depend upon his experience and intelligence, and the rate of speed at which the car is moving. Sly v. Union Depot R. Co. 134 Mo. 681.

The refusal of the conductor to stop the car will not justify a boy six years old in attempting to get off while the car is in motion. Cram v. Metropolitan R. Co. 112 Mass. 38.

It is negligence per se for a boy fifteen years old to attempt to board a moving horse car where the step by which he attempts to ascend is plainly defective. Dietrich v. Baltimore & H. S. R. Co. 59 Md. 847.

Whether it is negligence for a boy thirteen years old to get off from a street car before its motion had ceased is a question for the jury. Crissey v. Hestonville, M. & F. Pass. R. Co. 75 Pa. 83.

So, in case of a child ten years old. Philadelphia City Pass. R. Co. v. Hassard, 75 Pa. 367.

If the negligence of a boy in jumping from a moving car in front of one approaching from the opposite direction is the cause of his injury by the latter car, no recovery can be had for the injury. Hogan v. Central Park, N. & E. River R. Co. 124 Y. 847.

Electric or cable cars.

In Corlin v. West End Street R. Co. 184 Mass. 197, it was held that there was nothing to show that any different rule should be applied with respect to its being negligence to get upon a moving electric car than would be applied in case of horse cars.

The rule that the question is for the jury applies to both electric and horse cars. Central Pass. R. Co. v. Rose, 14 Ky. L. Rep. 304, Affirmed in 15 Ky. L. Rep. 209.

But in JAGGER v. PEOPLE'S STREET R. Co. the rule of steam cars seems to have been applied to electric cars, and cases involving railroad trains are cited to sustain the ruling.

Whether or not it is negligence in a passenger to step off a moving train at the invitation of the conductor depends upon the further inquiry as to whether or not the train was going at such speed as to render the attempt obviously hazardous. Highland Ave. & B. R. Co. v. Winn, 98 Ala. 306.

If the act of jumping off is not the voluntary act of the person injured, but he is forced to do so by those in charge of the car, he will not be guilty of contributory negligence. Baber v. Broadway & S. Ave. R. Co. 10 Misc. 109.

If a boy is compelled to get off the car by the driver while it is in motion he cannot be held guilty of negligence. Day v. Brooklyn City R. Co. 12 Hun. 436.

If a boy ten years old jumps from a moving car because of the threats of the driver the question of his negligence is for the jury. Hestonville, M. & F. Pass. R. Co. v. Gray, 8 W. N. C. 421.

To avoid danger.

If the passenger is placed in a position of peril by the negligence of the carrier so that he is compelled to choose between the two evils of jumping from the moving car or being injured by the other peril, it will not be negligence for him to jump. Twomley v. Central Park, N. & E. R. Co. 69 N. Y. 153, 25 Am. Rep. 162.

The fact that a woman gets off a moving car upon its turning into the barns on refusal to stop to let her off, will not prevent her recovery for an injury caused thereby, if she had been subjected to insult upon being carried into the barns on a previous occasion, and thought that her only way to escape the same treatment again was to leave the car. Ashton v. Detroit City R. Co. 78 Mich. 587.

If the passenger is induced to jump off the car by an impending collision he will not be held guilty of negligence. Heath v. Glens Falls, S. H. & Ft. R. Street R. Co. 90 Hun. 560.

If it appears necessary to leave the car to avoid being injured by the running away of the horse it may not be negligence to do so if such action would be ordinary care on the part of careful persons of the class to which the injured person belongs under similar circumstances. Dimmey v. Wheeling & E. G. R. Co. 27 W. Va. 32, 55 Am. Rep. 232.

If the passenger jumps from the car to avoid the consequences of an impending collision his act will not be considered negligent. Washington & G. R. Co. v. Hickey, 5 App. D. C. 436.

Negligence after knowing peril.

In Woodard v. West Side R. Co. 71 Wis. 625, it is said that even if the plaintiff was guilty of negligence in attempting to board a moving car he could yet recover if his injury might have been prevented by the exercise of due care on the part of the driver in stopping the car if he knew that requested the conductor to stop the car at a particular point. His request not being immediately complied with he leaped from the car and was injured. That this was an act of contributory negligence does not appear to us to admit of doubt.

Hagan v. Philadelphia & G. Ferry Co. 15 Phila. 278; Pennsylvania R. Co. v. Aspell, 23 Pa. 150, 62 Am. Dec. 823; Booth, Street Railways, § 837, p. 461.

A street-railway company is not liable for a plaintiff had fallen and was being dragged by the car.

In Halohan v. Washington & G. R. Co. 8 Mackey, 814, where a person with one wooden leg was injured in an attempt to get on a moving car, the court assumes his negligence, and the case is made to turn upon the question whether or not the carrier was negligent in failing to take precautions to avoid injuring him after ascertaining that he was in peril.

Summary.

A person in getting onto or off from a street car cannot be reckless but must take proper care of himself.

The mere fact that the driver fails to entirely stop the car will not render the company liable for an injury to a passenger who attempts to get off, but it must also appear that the plaintiff used all reasonable care and diligence to avoid the consequences of the carrier's negligence. West End & A. S. R. Co. v. Mozely, 79 Ga. 463.

It is not any particular rate of speed by which the conduct of the passenger in entering or leaving a moving car is governed, but the rule is that of exercising ordinary care and caution under the circumstances surrounding him. Mettlesadt v. Ninth Ave. R. Co. 32 How. Pr. 423.

A person who attempts to board a moving trolley car at the front platform must exercise more care than though he attempts to enter from the rear platform, or after the car is stopped, and the mere fact that he is injured will not charge the carrier with liability unless negligence on its part is shown. Paulson v. Brooklyn City R. Co. 13 Misc. 387.

The question of proper care will depend on what the ordinarily prudent man would have done under the circumstances. If the speed of the car is great or the person is not in full control of his limbs by reason of injury or encumbrance the court may pronounce him guilty of negligence as matter of law. When the carrier is negligent and the car was moving at such rate when the attempt to board or alight was made that it would not be thought improper to do so by an ordinarily prudent man, the question of negligence is for the jury. And it seems that if the attempt of the injured person did not contribute to the accident the court may hold, as matter of law, that this act will not bar his recovery. A few cases in which the question has arisen have not passed upon it directly.

In Basch v. North Chicago Street R. Co. 40 Ill. App. 583, it seems to be assumed that plaintiff was negligent in attempting to board a moving car.

In Outen v. North & South Street R. Co. 94 Ga. 662, a nonsuit was held proper where at the moment plaintiff attempted to alight the driver struck the horses, which caused a jerk and the fall of the passenger; but it is not distinctly shown whether the ruling is placed upon the ground of want of negligence upon the part of the carrier because the driver did not know that the passenger was attempting to get off, or of negligence on the part of the passenger, a man seventy years old, in attempting to get off from the moving car. H. F. F.

personal injury sustained by a passenger while attempting to get off a car at a street crossing while it is in motion, and in violation of the company's rules, and without anything having been said or done by the company's employees to induce her to get off.

Per Curiam:

The plaintiff, in going from the business part of the city of Scranton to his home, used the defendant's line of cars. To shorten his walk, he was in the habit of leaping from the cars at a point where they did not ordinarily stop, from which point he walked to his home. It is alleged that the conductor and motorman knew of this habit, and, at a signal from him, would slacken the speed of the car down to about 4 or 5 miles per hour, in order to relieve him from the dangers incident to this mode of alighting as much as they reasonably could. The company was not bound by this practice of the plaintiff, or by the good nature of its employees. It is the duty of the street-railway company to stop its cars at suitable places for passengers to leave them, and remain stationary long enough to enable them to do so safely (Crissey v. Heatmville, M. & F. Pass. R. Co. 75 Pa. 83); and it is contributory negligence to leap from a moving car (Pennsylvania R. Co. v. Aspell, 23 Pa. 147, 62 Am. Dec. 828). To justify such action, the motion must be so inconsiderable that a person of reasonable prudence, exercising ordinary care, would not hesitate about the safety of the attempt to alight. Stager v. Ridge Ave. Pass. R. Co. 119 Pa. 70. If the evidence leaves the question whether the car was fairly in motion in doubt, then the question of contributory negligence must go to the jury. If it does not, it is a question of law. This case, upon all the evidence, belongs to the latter class. Whether the attempt to leap from an electric car moving at the rate of from 4 to 5 miles per hour is contributory negligence in the passenger may properly be declared by the court, on a motion for a compulsory nonsuit, and it was properly declared in this case.

The judgment is affirmed.

WARREN LINOLINE & GASOLINE

WALWORTH MANUFACTURING COM-PANY, Trustees.

(108 Mass. 564.)

1. A partnership association organized under the laws of Pennsylvania is regarded in Massachusetts as an association or partnership, and not as a corporation, for the purpose of bringing an action against it.
2. A statute providing that an association or partnership can be sued in its company name has no extraterritorial force or effect.

(June 15, 1897.)

APPEAL by plaintiff from an order of the Superior Court for Suffolk County dismissing an action which sought to collect a claim against the Warren Linoline & Gasoline Works, Limited, from assets in the possession of the Walworth Manufacturing Company.

Lathrop, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

It is conceded by the plaintiff that as the jurisdiction of the court depends upon charging the Walworth Manufacturing Company as trustee, inasmuch as there was no service upon the principal defendant, the action was properly dismissed upon discharging the trustee. The question, then, is whether the trustee was properly discharged, and this depends upon whether the principal defendant, an association formed under the laws of the state of Pennsylvania, is a partnership or a corporation. The trustee's answers to interrogatories refer to Brightly's Purdon's Dig. 12th ed. 1086-1088, and to the cases of Eliot v. Himrod, 108 Pa. 569, and Sheble v. Strong, 128 Pa. 315, as containing the law relative to the statement in the answer that the principal defendant was a partnership, and not a corporation. From the Digest it appears that such an association is styled a "partnership association," and not a corporation. By the terms of the various acts which have been passed upon the subject such an association may be formed by three or more persons. The capital is alone to be liable for the debts. There is no personal liability of the members, except to the extent of any unpaid subscription, if certain provisions of the act are complied with. "Interests in such partnership associations" are declared to be personal estate, and are transferable, under such rules and regulations as shall from time to time be prescribed; but, if there are no such rules and regulations, the transferee of any interest in any such association is not entitled to any participation in the subsequent business of the association, unless elected to membership therein, by a vote of a majority of the members in number and value of their interests. The business is to be conducted by a board of managers. The duration of the association may be fixed by the articles of association, but is not to exceed twenty years. Power to adopt and use a common seal is given in case the association has occasion to execute a deed of conveyance or bonds and mortgages. Land sold to the association or by it is required to be conveyed in the name of the association. It is further provided: "Said association shall sue and be sued in their association name; and, when suit is brought against any such association, service thereof shall be made upon the chairman, secretary, or treasurer thereof, which service shall be as complete and effective as if made upon each and every member of such association." In Eliot v. Himrod, 108 Pa. 569, 580, it is said by Mr. Justice Trunkley, in delivering the opinion of the court: "The formation of a limited partnership association is materially different from the creation of a corporation. Such association is treated in the statute as a partnership which, upon the performance of certain acts, shall possess specified rights and immunities. In contemplation that the association may consist of many members, for convenience it is clothed with many of the features and powers of a corporation, such as the right to sue and be sued, grant and receive, in the association name. But no man can purchase the interest of a member and participate in the subsequent business, unless by a vote of the majority of the members in number and value of their interests. No charter is granted to the persons who record their statement." Sheble v. Strong, 128 Pa. 318, is to the same effect.

If the question presented were an open one in this commonwealth, it might well be held that such an association could be considered to have so many of the characteristics of a corporation that it might be treated as one. At common law, a joint-stock company formed for business purposes is considered in this commonwealth merely as a partnership. Tappan v. Bailey, 4 Met. 529; Tyrrell v. Washburn, 6 Allen, 466. The same rule has been applied to joint-stock associations formed under the laws of the state of New York, which do not differ, in any essential respect, from the laws of Pennsylvania. Taft v. Ward, 106 Mass. 518, 111 Mass. 518; Bodwell v. Eastman, 106 Mass. 526; Gott v. Dinmore, 111 Mass. 45, 51; Boston & L. R. Co. v. Pearson, 128 Mass. 445. See also Frost v. Walker, 60 Me. 468; Dinmore v. Philadelphia & R. R. Co. 11 Phila. 483. In Taft v. Ward, 106 Mass. 518, 524, speaking of the New York statutes, it was said by Chief Justice Chapman: "These statutes provide, in substance, that any association, consisting of seven or more shareholders or associates, may sue and be sued in the name of the president or treasurer; that in such a suit a judgment may be rendered against the company; and until an execution is issued against the company, and returned unsatisfied, no action shall be maintained against individuals. These statutes seem to apply to all copartnerships consisting of seven or more members. The members of such companies are authorized to hold their interests in shares, which are assignable like shares of stock in a corporation, and the action against the members is regarded as supplementary to the action against the company. Waterbury v. Merchants' Union Exp. Co. 50 Barb. 157; Robbins v. Wells, 1 Robt. 666. So far as these statutes relate to the procedure in courts for the recovery of debts, they are limited to the state of New York, for each state adopts its own forms of remedy. Story, Conf. L. §§ 556-558. The plaintiff could not in this commonwealth bring an action against the president or secretary, and obtain a judgment against the company by its name; nor could he bring an action against the members, or any of them, as a supplement to such an action. In order to do so, we must hold that the statutes of New York prescribing forms of action are in force here. In this commonwealth, such a company is a mere copartnership." There is nothing inconsistent with an association being a partnership that it has shares, or that the shares are transferable, or that the death of a member shall not work a dissolution of the partnership. Phillips v. Blutchford, 187 Mass. 510. See also Headley v. Middlesex County Comrs. 105 Mass. 519; Gleason v. McKay, 134 Mass. 419. The case mostly relied on by the plaintiff is Liverpool & L. & F. Ins. Co. v. Oliver, 77 U. S. 10 Wall. 566, 19 L. ed. 1029, which was taken to the Supreme Court of the United States on a writ of error from this court. See Oliver v. Liverpool & L. & F. Ins. Co. 100 Mass. 531. It was a bill in equity, filed by the treasurer of the commonwealth, under Stat. 1862, chap. 224, § 11, to restrain the defendant from prosecuting its business, until the tax assessed upon it by § 2 of the statute had been paid. This section provided that "each fire, marine, and fire and marine insurance company incorporated or associated under the laws of any government or state, other than one of the United States," should annually pay a certain tax. The defendant was an English company, formed for the business of insurance, and organized under a deed of settlement. Its property was divided into transferable shares. It had power to sue and be sued by the name of its chairman, and a suit did not abate by reason of the death of such officer. The company could sue its own members and be sued by them. Execution on any judgment recovered against the company could be issued against any proprietor. The statute under which it was formed, and subsequent statutes, declared that it should not be deemed to be incorporated. The company was composed in part of British subjects, and in part of citizens of the state of New York. This court, after stating that it was not a pure corporation nor a pure partnership, but was an association intermediate between corporations known to the common law and ordinary partnerships, and was so far clothed with corporate powers that it might be treated, for the purposes of taxation, as an artificial body, proceeded to say: "We think the defendants are an association of the kind to which the statute of 1862 was expressly intended to apply, as well as to bodies wholly corporate in their character; and that, being permitted by the comity of our laws to exercise their functions within this commonwealth, they can claim no exemption from regulations appropriate to their collective action on account of the citizenship or nationality of their individual members." In the Supreme Court of the United States the decree of this court was affirmed, on the ground that the company was a foreign corporation; but Mr. Justice Bradley, while agreeing in the result, differed on the question whether the company was a corporation. He was of opinion that it was one of those special partnerships called "joint-stock companies," and that it could not sue or be sued in this country without legislative aid. This view of Mr. Justice Bradley is in accord with the view of this court, and we are not aware that the view taken by the Supreme Court of the United States has been followed in this commonwealth. The decisions which we have already cited show that a foreign joint-stock company is considered as an association or partnership, and not as a corporation.

An examination of the statutes further shows that the legislature has clearly recognized the distinction between the foreign corporations and associations; and that, where it has deemed it best that an act should apply to an association as well as to a corporation, it has said so in plain language. Thus, Stat. 1882, chap. 106, relating to the taxation of foreign mining, quarrying, and oil companies, and requiring the appointment of an agent here, upon whom process may be served, uses the language "every corporation, company, or association." Stat. 1857, chap. 214, in § 1, provides: "When consistent with the context, and not obviously used in a different sense, the term 'company' or 'insurance company,' as used herein, includes all corporations, associations, partnerships, or individuals engaged as principals in the business of insurance." The language is the same in Stat. 1894, chap. 522, § 1. By Stat. 1888, chap. 429, § 11, "fraternal beneficiary corporations, associations, or societies," organized under the laws of another state, and then doing business here, were allowed to continue business without incorporating under the act. But by Stat. 1893, chap. 40, § 1, this was amended by striking out the words "associations or societies." Stat. 1884, chap. 830, requires "every corporation established under the laws of any other state or foreign country," and hereafter having a usual place of business here, before doing business, to appoint in writing the commissioner of corporations, or his successor in office, to be its true and lawful attorney, upon whom process might be served. Stat. 1888, chap. 321, allows "manufacturing corporations established under the laws of other states," which have complied with the provisions of Stat. 1884, chap. 830, to purchase and hold such real estate here as may be necessary for conducting their business. By Stat. 1893, chap. 311, "foreign corporations engaged in the business of selling or negotiating bonds, mortgages, notes, or other choses in action" are made subject to the provisions of Stat. 1894, chap. 830. Stat. 1896, chap. 391, contains a provision relating to the personal liability, under certain circumstances, of "the officers and members or stockholders in any corporation established under the laws of any other state or other country." See also Stat. 1895, chap. 157. Many other instances of legislation might be given where the distinction between a corporation proper and a mere association or organization is shown to be clearly in mind.

Unless the principal defendant can be considered a corporation, it cannot be sued here under the name which the laws of Pennsylvania authorize it to use. Such laws have no extraterritorial force or effect. The trustee, therefore, was properly discharged.

In the opinion of a majority of the court, the order discharging the trustee and dismissing the action must be affirmed.

DETROIT CYCLE COMPANY, Limited,

1. Subscriptions to the capital stock of a partnership association may be paid by the giving of a promissory note, if the note is immediately converted into money and the proceeds applied for the benefit of the corporation.
2. The jury must determine whether or not the giving of notes in payment of subscriptions to the capital stock of a corporation was in good faith.
3. A decree awarding a mandamus requiring a trial judge to take evidence and award an execution for unpaid subscriptions to capital stock of a corporation as required by statute in a proceeding to which the stockholders are not parties is not res judicata upon the question of the right to enforce payment of the subscriptions so as to prevent the stockholders after being made parties to the proceeding from showing that a receiver has been appointed who is entitled to collect all the assets of the corporation.
4. A proceeding under the statute for an execution for unpaid subscriptions to corporate stock cannot be maintained after the appointment of a receiver for the purpose of collecting the assets of the corporation.

ERROR to the Circuit Court for Wayne County to review a judgment in favor of plaintiff in a proceeding brought to hold the individual defendants liable as partners for a debt of the association. Reversed.

NOTE.—As to execution against a shareholder in a limited partnership association, see Rouse, H. & Co. v. Donovan (Mich.) 27 L. R. A. 577, 88 L. R. A.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. Atkinson & Atkinson and Malcolm McGregor for plaintiffs in error.

Mr. Jonathan Palmer, Jr., for plaintiff in error John T. Holmes:

A limited partnership association is organized as an artificial being distinct from its members, with an existence and individuality of its own. It exists only from recording the articles and is a creature of the legislature. It holds and conveys its property, sues and is sued as a distinct person. The members have no joint proprietary interests in the specific assets of the association, as have members of a limited partnership.

Bates, Limited Partnership, § 70, and cases cited.

Whether land or chattels, the member's interest is always personal estate (Acts 1885, p. 16, § 8 How. Anno. Stat. § 2368) for all purposes, both at law and in equity, and is identical in nature with the interest of a member of any corporation, and it is "stock."

Culver*, 30 Hun. 1; Re Klaus, 67 Wis. 407; 1 Thomp. Corp. §§ 1070-1072; Cook, Stock & Stockholders, § 12.

A limited partnership association more closely resembles a corporation than it does a special or limited partnership. It is frequently compared to a corporation and has been held to be a corporation or quasi corporation. It is not a mere common-law partnership plus the attribute of limited liability.

Messrs. Bowen, Douglas, & Whiting for defendant in error.

Moore, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

Rouse, Hazard, & Co., the plaintiff in these proceedings, recovered a judgment upon November 8, 1894, for the sum of $1,761, damages and costs, in the Wayne circuit court, against the Detroit Cycle Company, Limited. Upon this judgment, execution was issued, and returned wholly unsatisfied, after being in the hands of the sheriff of Wayne county for more than twenty days. The Detroit Cycle Company, Limited, is a limited partnership association, organized and existing under chapter 79 of Howell's Annotated Statutes; and the respondents herein, Edwin B. Robinson, John A. Matheson, and John T. Holmes, were the original subscribing members thereof, and remained so during the whole course of the proceedings in this case. After the execution was returned unsatisfied, plaintiff applied to the Wayne circuit court, under the provisions of § 2366, 1 How. Anno. Stat., to have ascertained the amount of the subscriptions, respectively, of the respondents to the capital of the Detroit Cycle Company, Limited, not paid up, and for an order that execution issue against said respondents for the amounts so ascertained. The respondents successfully resisted this application in the circuit court, and thereupon the plaintiff applied to this court for a writ of mandamus to require the circuit judge "to compel the Detroit Cycle Company, Limited, and the respondents, to produce the books of the company, especially its subscription list book, showing the names of the members of the association, and the amount of capital remaining to be paid upon their respective subscriptions, and also to receive such other evidence as might be offered by the plaintiff and the members of the association concerning the amount of capital remaining to be paid upon the subscription of the respective members of the association, and, after ascertaining the truth in regard thereto, to forthwith order execution to issue against the said members for the amount of their unpaid subscriptions, if any there should be." The writ was granted after argument in this court, and the case is reported as Rouse, H. & Co. v. Donovan, 104 Mich. 234, 27 L. R. A. 577. On the filing of the respondents' answers to the plaintiff's bill of complaint, an issue was framed, and ordered tried before a jury. The issue was: "In what amount, if any, was the said John T. Holmes, John A. Matheson, and Edwin B. Robinson, and any or each of them, indebted to the said Detroit Cycle Company, Limited, on account of any unpaid subscriptions to the capital of the said company?" This issue was tried before the Honorable Robert E. Frazer, circuit judge, with a jury, on April 16, 1895; and, under the charge of the court, the jury found that each of the respondents was indebted to the Detroit Cycle Company, Limited, on account of unpaid subscriptions to the capital stock of the said company, in the sum of $1,833.33. Certain points of law were reserved by the court for argument after the verdict was rendered; and after an argument of these questions, in accordance with the statute (1 How. Anno. Stat. § 2366) and the mandate of this court, an execution was ordered on January 8, 1896, and issued against each of the respondents, for the amount of $1,833.33, or so much thereof as might be necessary to satisfy plaintiff's judgment, with costs. This order, and the proceedings upon which the same was based, respondents are now endeavoring to review in this court by writ of error.

The Detroit Cycle Company, Limited, filed its articles in the office of the register of deeds for Wayne county, Michigan, as a limited partnership association, under the provisions of chapter 79 of 1 Howell's Annotated Statutes, on November 1, 1892. The respondents were the original members of said association, and subscribed for equal subscriptions, amounting to the sum of $3,333.33 for each respondent. There was paid in by each member thereafter the sum of $1,500, in cash; and there remained still unpaid by each of said members up to about the 6th day of October, 1893, the sum of $1,833.33. On or about October 6, 1893, the association became financially embarrassed, owing the Gormully & Jeffery Manufacturing Company, of Chicago, between $14,000 and $16,000, and owing two local banks in Detroit about $6,000. The debts to the banks were in the form of notes made by the Detroit Cycle Company, Limited, and indorsed by all three of the respondents individually, and were further collaterally secured by an assignment of bicycle contracts. An arrangement was made between the Gormully & Jeffery Manufacturing Company and the respondents, whereby the Gormully & Jeffery Manufacturing Company were given a chattel mortgage on all the property of the Detroit Cycle Company, Limited; and at the same time there were assigned to the Gormully & Jeffery Manufacturing Company all the bicycle contracts, including those held by the banks as collateral security. At the same time, and as a part of the same arrangement, each of the respondents gave to the Detroit Cycle Company, Limited, his note for $1,833.33, given for the purpose, as each of the respondents testify, of paying up their subscriptions to the capital stock of the Detroit Cycle Company, Limited. These notes were immediately indorsed in the name of the Detroit Cycle Company, Limited, by the respondents, and turned over to the Gormully & Jeffery Manufacturing Company as a further security for the indebtedness of the Detroit Cycle Company, Limited, $3 L. R. A.

to it. Thereupon the Gormully & Jeffery Manufacturing Company advanced enough money to take up the notes of the Detroit Cycle Company, Limited, in the two local banks in Detroit; and, these notes having been taken up, the collateral security for the same was turned over by the banks to the Gormully & Jeffery Manufacturing Company. These notes were all payable in one year from the date they bore, namely, October 6, 1893, with 6 per cent interest, and were never paid by the respondents, and were never protested, though they are still outstanding. Immediately after the chattel mortgage was given to Gormully & Jeffery Manufacturing Company, the latter sent a man to Detroit to take charge of the business of the Detroit Cycle Company, Limited; and the Gormully & Jeffery Manufacturing Company sent on new goods, and respondents claim they expect to pay them, and conducted the business. No amendments of the original articles of association, and no schedule, as provided for in 1 How. Anno. Stat. § 2365, or any other paper except the original articles of association, were ever filed in the office of the register of deeds for Wayne county, Michigan. It also appeared that in the secretary's records of the minutes of the stockholders' and directors' meetings of the association running from October 14, 1892, to January 11, 1894, no record anywhere appeared authorizing or making a call for the unpaid subscriptions of the capital stock of the association, or authorizing the receipt of the respective members' notes therefor, although under date of October 6, 1893, there is a record of a meeting of the directors, and the authorization by them of the execution and delivery of a chattel mortgage to the Gormully & Jeffery Manufacturing Company. The absence of any record of the receipt of the members' notes was explained by the secretary, from the fact that he did not enter the minutes of all the meetings in his record, although one of the three members testified that he did not hear of any resolution to this effect, but that it was only agreed to between the members.

The defendants requested the court to charge the jury as follows: "It appearing from the undisputed evidence in this proceeding that the respondents gave their promissory notes to the company for the amount of their unpaid subscriptions, which notes were accepted by the company in payment thereof, and which notes are now in the hands of third parties, and the respondents are liable thereon, the verdict must be for the respondents." "It appearing from the undisputed evidence in this suit that the respondents gave their promissory notes for the amount of their unpaid subscriptions to the company, which notes were taken by the company, and the amount thereof realized in cash, and applied upon existing indebtedness of the company, the making of said notes and realization of the money upon them constituted a payment of said unpaid subscriptions, and the verdict must be for the respondents." If the foregoing are refused: "(6) If the jury believes that the notes in question were given in payment of the unpaid subscriptions, and were accepted by the company as such, and by them transferred to third parties, who now hold them, and the respondents are liable thereon, then the verdict must be for the respondents. (7) If the jury believe that the notes in question were given for the purpose of paying up the unpaid subscriptions, and the same were taken, and cash realized upon them, which cash was applied in satisfaction of existing indebtedness of the company, so that the company received full benefit thereof, the giving of the notes and the application of the proceeds thereof constituted payment of the subscriptions, and the verdict must be for the respondents." The trial judge declined to give these requests. He entertained the view that the statute authorizing the formation of these limited copartnership associations is a special enactment, permitting such organizations with limited liability as to stockholders, and that all the necessary and essential requirements of the statute must be complied with. He held that this had not been done, and that whether the notes had been given and received for the purpose of paying the balance due on subscriptions was not important, and directed a verdict against the defendants.

It is the claim of the plaintiff that the law as applied to limited partnerships is to be applied to associations like the defendant, and that subscriptions to the capital cannot be paid by giving notes. On the part of the defendants it is claimed that the law as applicable to corporations should be applied to these associations, and that if defendants gave their notes to pay for the capital subscribed by them, and these notes were received by the defendant association as payment, and the proceeds of the notes were received by the association and applied to the payment of its debts, this would constitute a good payment of the capital subscribed, and would release the members from further liability.

Nearly all the questions involved in this proceeding are involved in the case of Staver & A. Mfg. Co. v. Blake (decided at the present term of court). (Mich.) post, 798. It will not be necessary to refer to the opinion in that case further than to say that, so far as the question of whether the law of limited partnerships applies to the defendant association or the law of corporations, the answer is that the case must be controlled by the law applicable to corporations.

We have no doubt that subscriptions to capital stock to corporations may be paid by the giving of promissory notes, especially if the notes are at once converted into money, and the proceeds applied for the benefit of the corporation. Goodrich v. Reynolds, 31 Ill. 490, 83 Am. Dec. 240; Hardy v. Merriceather, 14 Ind. 208; Stoddard v. Shetucket Foundry Co. 84 Conn. 542; Mages v. Badger, 30 Barb. 246; Vermont C. R. Co. v. Clarys, 21 Vt. 80; Pacific Trust Co. v. Dorsey, 72 Cal. 55; Clark v. Farrington, 11 Wis. 807; Blunt v. Walker, 11 Wis. 849, 78 Am. Dec. 709; Lyon v. Ewings, 17 Wis. 63; Andrews v. Hart, 17 Wis. 806; Western Bank v. Tallman, 17 Wis. 580. It is the claim of the plaintiff that the notes were not given in good faith, and for the purpose of paying up the unpaid portion of the capital. We think the good faith of the transaction was a question for the jury, and that they should have been instructed as requested by counsel for defendants in the sixth and seventh requests to charge.

The record discloses that upon the application of the plaintiff's attorneys, the circuit court, in chancery, had appointed a receiver for the defendant company, Joseph F. Noera, filing the creditor's bill. A judgment creditor's bill was also filed by William A. Hulbert et al. against the defendants. John A. Stanberry was appointed receiver in both cases, and claimed the assets of defendant company. Both chancery suits are still pending. The solicitors for the complainants, in their behalf, and in behalf of the receiver in both cases, in open court, waived all claim to any of the unpaid subscriptions to the capital stock of the defendant that were unpaid by Robinson, Matheson, and Holmes against the claims of the plaintiff. Objection was made to this offer, and the court replied that he had serious doubt of the power of the receiver to waive the claim, or of the court to grant the waiver, but expressed himself as being settled in relation to the other points in the case. Defendants also introduced in evidence an application for execution under the same statute as is invoked in this proceeding, against the same respondents, for the same unpaid subscriptions, upon a judgment recovered by the W. Bingham Company, plaintiffs, against the defendants, in the circuit court of the United States for the eastern district of Michigan. The defendants asked to have the following requests to charge given to the jury: "(1) A receiver of all the property and assets of the defendant company having been appointed prior to the judgment in this suit, and being now in office, the plaintiffs have no standing in this proceeding, and are not entitled to the order asked. (2) It appearing that, since judgment was rendered in this suit, a receiver has been appointed in another suit of all the property and assets of the defendant company, the plaintiffs have no standing in this suit, and are not entitled to the order asked. It appearing from the evidence in this case that an application similar to the one in the present case has been made against the respondents in the circuit court of the United States for the eastern district of Michigan, upon a judgment recovered against the Detroit Cycle Company, Limited, by the W. Bingham Company, the respondents are therefore liable to have execution issued against them in each case for the amount of their subscriptions remaining unpaid and to be subjected to a double liability not contemplated by the statute under which the defendant association is organized. This being so, the plaintiffs' remedy is in equity, where the rights of all parties can be protected, and not by an application for an execution, such as is now pending before the court." The court refused to give either of these requests. This is assigned as error. It is now urged by counsel for plaintiffs that defendants cannot avail themselves of any defense they may have to this action growing out of the appointment of receivers, for the reason that the receivers were appointed before these proceedings were begun, and before the mandamus case of Rouse, H. & Co. v. Donoran, 104 Mich. 284, 27 L. R. A. 677, was decided. It is their claim that as the defense might then have been interposed, and was not, the matter must be treated as res judicata. An inspection of the Case of Rouse, Hazard, & Co. discloses that neither of the respondents, Holmes, Matheson, or Robinson were parties to that proceeding, or that they took any part in it, except to appear in the case before the circuit judge, and enter their protest against the circuit judge entertaining jurisdiction over them. There was nothing in the record to indicate that any receivers had been appointed, and we are not prepared to hold that the case is res judicata. The record as now made does disclose that, before this proceeding was brought, a receiver was appointed by the chancery side of the court; and he still holds his appointment. A receiver is an officer of the court. He is undoubtedly entitled to the assets of the defendant company if it has any. He is spoken of as the "hand of the court." High, Receivers, chap. 1. It would be a very anomalous position, indeed, if this proceeding can be maintained after a receiver has been appointed for the very purpose of collecting the assets of the defendant association to pay its creditors. Defendants' requests 1 and 2 should have been given. Judgment is reversed, and no new trial ordered.

Long, Ch. J., and Montgomery, J., did not sit. The other Justices concur.

STAVAR & ABBOTT MANUFACTURING COMPANY, Pff. in Err.,

v.

Katherine A. BLAKE et al.

(.....Mich.....)

1. Technical noncompliance with the statute in the formation of a partnership association, and failure to comply with the statutory requirements in its subsequent management, will not render subsequent stockholders who had no knowledge of the defects and had no intent to become partners liable as such, in the absence of a statutory provision making them so, for goods furnished by one who dealt with the concern as a limited association.
2. Omission in a single instance by the manager of a partnership association of the word "limited" in dealing with a correspondent will not render the members of the association liable as partners in the absence of anything to show that any indebtedness, damage, or liability arose in consequence of that act.

(December 24, 1896.)

ERROR to the Circuit Court for Kent County to review a judgment in favor of defendants in an action brought to hold defendants individually liable for goods sold to a limited corporation of which they were members. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

NOTE.—As to the nature of limited partnership associations, see the preceding cases of Edwards v. Warren Linoline & Gasoline Works, ante, 791; and Rouse, H. & Co. v. Detroit Cycle Co. (Mich.) ante, 794, with footnote references thereto. 38 L. R. A.

Messrs. Bundy & Travis, with Messrs. Wyllie & Clapperton, for plaintiff in error: The joint-stock company is an association of persons for the purpose of business, having a capital stock divided into shares and governed by articles of association.

Cook, Stock & Stockholders, § 504; Whipple v. Parker, 29 Mich. 381.

It lies midway between a copartnership and a corporation. Like a copartnership it has no limited liability of its members for the debts of the company, and like a corporation it is not dissolved by a transfer of stock.

Cox v. Bodfish, 35 Me. 302.

The liability for indebtedness incurred for goods sold to a company of this character seeks out and attaches to the persons engaged in the enterprise, and that whether they intended to be individually liable or not.

Davidson v. Holden, 55 Conn. 112.

Exemption from individual liability is derived solely from statutory provisions.

The statutory privilege and immunity offered by the statute can only be secured by the strict fulfillment of the preliminary conditions.

The fund must be paid in money, and in the sole control of the general partner on the day of the special partnership is formed and before the certificate is filed.

Richardson v. Hogg, 88 Pa. 153; Durent v. Abendroth, 69 N. Y. 148, 25 Am. Rep. 156, 97 N. Y. 132; Maginn v. Lawrence, 18 Jones & S. 285; Haggerty v. Foster, 103 Mass. 17.

Payment in goods or property does not justify an affidavit of a cash payment.

Bement v. Philadelphia Impact Brick Mach. Co. 12 Phila. 494; Van Ingen v. Whitman, 63 N. Y. 518; Argall v. Smith, 3 Denio, 435.

The care taken by the statute to prevent parties from being misled by the use of the name, even of the special partner, or by his interference (§ 2343), illustrates the caution with which the common-law, personal liability is relieved.

Farnsworth v. Boardman, 181 Mass. 115; Madison County Bank v. Gould, 5 Hill, 309.

Blake subscribed for $19,800 of the $26,000 capital, of which it is certified that he has paid in $12,800 in cash, but nothing is said of how or when the remaining $7,000 is to be paid in. So, as to more than one third of the total capital, the written statement is defective on its face, and should be so ruled as a matter of law by the court.

Vanhorn v. Corcoran, 127 Pa. 255, 4 L. R. A. 386.

If parties seek to have all the advantage of a partnership, and yet limit their liability as to creditors, they must comply strictly with the act.

Maloney v. Bruce, 94 Pa. 249; Eliot v. Himrod, 108 Pa. 569; Hill v. Stetler, 127 Pa. 145; Vanhorn v. Corcoran, 127 Pa. 255, 4 L. R. A. 386; Briar Hill Coal & I. Co. v. Atlas Works, 146 Pa. 290.

The defendants at common law are primarily liable as individuals. The privilege and immunity they claim are a sweeping abrogation of the common law, and the invariable rule applied to all such cases in a strict one.

The question is simply, Have they complied with the statute? If so, they are entitled to its benefit, otherwise not.

Davidson v. Holden, 55 Conn. 103; Vanhorn v. Corcoran, 127 Pa. 268, 4 L. R. A. 386; Merchants & Mfrs. Bank v. Stone, 38 Mich. 780; People, Stewart, v. Young Men's Father Matthew & T. A. Benef. Soc. No. 1, 41 Mich. 67.

A corporation cannot exist in this state, even de facto, in the absence of a law authorizing it.

Eaton v. Walker, 76 Mich. 579, 6 L. R. A. 102; Taggart, Mason, v. Perkins, 78 Mich. 303.

A partnership association under such a statute is not a corporation.

Chapman v. Barney, 129 U. S. 677, 32 L. ed. 800; People, Winchester, v. Coleman, 188 N. Y. 279, 16 L. R. A. 188; Gregg v. Sandford, 28 U. S. App. 818, 65 Fed. Rep. 151, 12 C. C. A. 526.

The estoppel has never been based solely on the fact of recognition by the plaintiff, but there must also have been recognition by the state.

Eaton v. Walker, 76 Mich. 590, 6 L. R. A. 102; Eliot v. Himrod, 108 Pa. 580; Hill v. Steller, 127 Pa. 163.

Under the limited partnership acts it has uniformly been held that they must be strictly complied with in order to acquire their benefits.

The payment of his capital by the special partner must be in actual cash; neither property nor bonds, securities, debts, or promises will suffice, except in states permitting property contribution.

These companies cannot be treated as corporations for the purpose of applying the doctrine of estoppel, in order to permit them to evade and ignore the statute with impunity.

Our Constitution contains a clause inserted for the express purpose of preventing just what defendants contend happened here.

Thomas v. Collins, 58 Mich. 64; Bissell v. Durfee, 58 Mich. 239.

Mr. Vernon H. Smith, amicus curiæ, on behalf of plaintiff in error:

There is no provision in the act to exempt anyone from the liability of a partner, unless the statute has been substantially complied with.

Bates, Limited Partn. 27-29; Van Ingen v. Whitman, 62 N. Y. 513; Henkel v. Heyman, 91 Ill. 96.

There must be strict compliance with the statute else the partners are personally liable as general partners.

Substantial compliance is held to be necessary by some courts, and the paying in of the capital is a vital element.

Smith v. Argall, 6 Hill, 479; Argall v. Smith, 8 Denio, 435; Bowen v. Argall, 24 Wend. 501; Madison County Bank v. Gould, 5 Hill, 811; Van Ingen v. Whitman, 62 N. Y. 513; Holliday v. Bryant, 5 Allen, 91; Locke v. Lewis, 124 Mass. 19.

Such an association is a partnership with a limited liability, and not a corporation.

Bates, Limited Partn. 248; Lennig v. Penn Morocco Co. 16 W. N. C. 114.

The principles governing as to the personal liability of members are the same whether the organization is called a limited partnership or a partnership association, limited.

Hill v. Steller, 127 Pa. 145; Guillou v. Peterson, 89 Pa. 163; Hite Natural Gas Co.'s Appeal, 118 Pa. 436; Lennig v. Penn Morocco Co. 16 W. N. C. 114.

The party invoking the estoppel must have been misled, and so acted that it would be unjust to seek to undo what has been done.

The doctrine applicable to de facto corporations does not apply, because it appears that the attempt to organize was not bona fide.

Beach, Priv. Corp. § 163; Durant v. Adendorff, 69 N. Y. 148, 25 Am. Rep. 158.

Messrs. Fitzgerald & Barry, amici curiæ, also on behalf of plaintiff in error:

These partnership associations are not in any sense corporations, and are not intended to be governed by the law relating to corporations.

Eaton v. Walker, 76 Mich. 579, 6 L. R. A. 102.

The original partners obtained no immunity from personal liability by their actions, and could not transmit any to their assignee, Mrs. Blake, and it is not pretended that any action was taken, tending to association, since her purchase.

Wherefore there is no immunity from the common-law liability, as general partners.

It is no answer to a suit against partners who have not complied with the statute to say that plaintiff has dealt with the defendants as a partnership association limited, as it is impossible to deal with them in any ordinary mercantile transaction in any different manner in the one capacity than in the other.

Sheble v. Strong, 128 Pa. 315.

Messrs. Charles B. Blair and Fletcher & Wanty, for defendants in error:

Assuming that irregularities are shown, and that the organization was not legally made; and also assuming that subsequent irregularities are shown in the way the company and its affairs were conducted,—the plaintiff cannot take advantage of them, nor hold the defendants liable personally as partners, whether the company be held to be a corporation or something else.

This result follows, not so much because it is against public policy (Society Perun v. Cleveland, 48 Ohio St. 492; Swartwout v. Michigan Air Line R. Co. 24 Mich. 389; Pape v. Capitol Bank, 20 Kan. 440, 27 Am. Rep. 189), to allow private persons in a collateral proceeding to question the existence or due organization of a corporation with which they have dealt (Swartwout v. Michigan Air Line R. Co. 24 Mich. 389; Toledo & A. A. R. Co. v. Johnson, 49 Mich. 148; Grand Rapids v. Grand Rapids Hydraulic Co. 66 Mich. 606); or one of the partnership associations (Briar Hill Coal & I. Co. v. Atlas Works, 146 Pa. 290); but rather because the plaintiff cannot "call in question the corporate existence of the company and charge against the individual members the precise obligation which was unequivocally accepted as a corporate one."

Our Constitution is express upon the subject.

Such an association has "powers" and privileges of corporations not enjoyed by individuals or partnerships.

Tide Water Pipe Co. v. State Bd. of Assessors, 57 N. J. L. 516, 27 L. R. A. 684; Gregg v. Sandford, 28 U. S. App. 313, 65 Fed. Rep. 151, 12 C. C. A. 525; *Hillington v. The associates can do business as a distinct person and without any individual liability of the associates. That is the most distinctive attribute of corporations.

No status enabling associates to do this is known to the law except that of corporations.

People, Winchester, v. Coleman, 183 N. Y. 279, 16 L. R. A. 183.

The property of the association is not only held in its own name, but the general law of descent and distribution does not apply, and the rules of succession are different from those applying to individuals and partnerships.

Thompson v. Waters, 25 Mich. 245, 12 Am. Rep. 243

This is alone held to be sufficient to create a corporation by implication, since land cannot be so held by individuals, singly or collectively.

Dunn v. University of Oregon, 9 Or. 857; Mahony v. Bank of State, 4 Ark. 620.

These associations are joint-stock companies. Rouse, H. & Co. v. Donnan, 104 Mich. 234, 26 L. R. A. 577, and cases supra.

So are any of our ordinary business and commercial corporations. Both are incorporated joint-stock companies, and the terms "corporation" and "incorporated joint-stock company" are convertible—they mean the same thing.

The radical difference between a limited partnership and a partnership association is manifest.

Courts cannot attach limitations or provisions to an act because in other similar acts they have been incorporated.

State v. Sparrow, 89 Mich. 269; Keeler v. Dawson, 73 Mich. 601; Bonnell v. Griswold, 80 N. Y. 128.

Where an act prescribes penalties for failure to observe certain terms it is conclusively presumed that the intent was to exclude other penalties.

Grant, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The defendants are the members and owners of the stock of the Grand Rapids Storage & Transfer Company, Limited, an association organized May 13, 1890, under chapter 79, How. Anno. Stat. The plaintiff is a manufacturing corporation of Chicago, Illinois. It sues for merchandise alleged to have been sold and delivered to the defendants. The declaration is upon the common counts. The bill of particulars is for merchandise sold, for which notes were given, "executed by the name of Grand Rapids Storage & Transfer Company, Limited," dated January, May, and October, 1895. No claim is made that these defendants made individual promises, upon the faith of which these goods were sold and delivered, or that they had ever expressly formed a partnership, or that they had ever held themselves out to plaintiff as copartners. The sole basis for the right of recovery against them is the failure of the original organizers to comply with the statute in organizing, and noncompliance with the statute in carrying on the business after it was organized. These defects are stated by the learned counsel to be as follows: (1) The articles did not state when and how $7,000 were to be paid. (2) They falsely stated that $13,000 in cash had been paid in, when, as a matter of fact, property instead of money had been paid in, without any schedule containing the names of the parties contributing, with a description and valuation of the property contributed. (3) No yearly or other meetings of the members of the association were held for five years. (4) No managers of the association were elected for upward of five years. (5) No subscription book was kept, as required by the statute. (6) The statute was not observed in the matter of contracting debts. (7) The statute was not observed in using the word "Limited" in connection with the associate name. The defendants contend (1) that the company was properly organized; (2) that the plaintiff was estopped to deny that the association was legally organized, and to assert partnership relations, because it dealt exclusively with the association, and not with its members as a partnership; (3) that partnership associations limited are corporations; (4) that the express penalties imposed by the statute for its violation exclude all others; (5) that these defendants are subsequent stockholders, are innocent purchasers, and therefore not liable for irregularities in the organization or its management.

1. The Original Organization. There is no evidence of any dishonesty or bad faith in the formation of this association. It was organized under the advice of eminent counsel, who drew the articles. On March 29, 1890, eight citizens of Grand Rapids signed an agreement to form an association to be known as the Grand Rapids Storage & Transfer Company, Limited. This agreement specified the amount each was to contribute, $12,800 were thus contributed, and, when the articles were formed, this was so stated therein. This money was invested in the purchase of property and the erection of a building for the business of the association. The capital stock was fixed at $20,000. $7,200 remained unpaid, and the articles did not specify when or how it should be paid. Technically, the $12,800 of capital was not paid in cash at the time of the execution of the articles. It was, however, paid in shortly before, and for the purpose of forming the association, and had been expended in the purchase of property for it, and to use in its business.

Subsequent Management. It is true that meetings were not held, and managers elected, and debts incurred, in strict compliance with the statute. The business was conducted in the name of the association, and without any fraudulent intent or acts.

2. The Provisions of the Law. This act was passed in 1897, and is entitled "An Act Authorizing the Formation of Partnership Associations, in Which the Capital Subscribed Shall Alone Be Responsible for the Debts of the Association, Except under Certain Circumstances." Section 1 declares that "the capital shall alone be liable for the debts of such association. . . . Contributions to the capital stock may be made in real or personal estate, at a valuation to be approved by all the members subscribing to the capital of such associations." It also requires a schedule containing the names of such contributors, and the description and valuation of the property so contributed. Section 2 provides that the members shall not be liable on any judgment, decree, or order which shall be obtained against such association, or for any debt or engagement of such company, otherwise than is provided by the act. This section further provides for proceedings in such cases, and makes the members liable for labor debts. It limits the liabilities of stockholders to the amount of their unpaid subscriptions, and requires a subscription list to be kept, which shall be open to inspection by creditors and members at all reasonable times. Section 6 prohibits division of profits to diminish or impair the capital of the association, and makes anyone consenting to such a division liable to any persons interested or injured thereby, "to the amount of such division or impairment." Section 3 provides that "the omission of the word 'Limited' in the use of the name of the partnership association shall render each and every member of such partnership liable for any indebtedness, damage, or liability arising therefrom."

3. Plaintiff's action is based upon contract, not upon tort. It insists that the letter of the law, in the formation and conduct of the partnership association limited, has not been complied with, and therefore the law makes the defendants either partners or members of a joint-stock company at the common law, and therefore individually liable. Neither of these defendants was interested in this association at its organization. The husband of Mrs. Blake was one of the principal stockholders. She advanced to him the money which he originally paid in, and also the money with which he purchased, soon after the organization, most of the other stock. The stock was assigned to her as security. Subsequently, she discharged the liability of her husband, and took the stock, and now owns all but $200 worth, owned by the defendants Aldrich and Pantland. None of these were aware of any irregularity in the original organization or in its subsequent management. Plaintiff had for several years dealt with this association as such. Its correspondence was carried on with it. Its contracts were made with it. It had no belief that it was making any contract with these defendants, or that they were individually liable, for the correspondence and course of business refute any such conclusion. The very name of the association implied a warning to plaintiff that it was not dealing with the members or stockholders of this association in their individual capacity, but in their associate capacity, with their liability limited. It is presumed to know the law, and a reading of the statute would have shown it that the members of this association could only be held liable for the amount of stock subscribed. It therefore dealt with this association with full knowledge of the extent of the liability of its members. The liability fixed by statute is still open to it. If the managers or members of the association committed a fraud by which the plaintiff or any other creditor suffered damage, the law provides a remedy in tort, but not in contract. The law does not make contracts for parties. The law takes the contracts which have been made, and interprets them. The law does not permit A to deal and make contracts with B in one capacity, and then hold him liable in another. A partnership can only be held to exist inter se when the parties have so agreed. When no such partnership in fact exists, but a party has held himself out as such to third persons, who have dealt with him upon the faith of that relation, the law estops him to assert the true relation in order to avoid liability. Under no other circumstances does the law hold one liable as a partner who is not in fact a partner. This court said, speaking through Justice Cooley in Beecher v. Bush, 45 Mich. 193, 40 Am. Rep. 455: "If parties intend no partnership the courts should give effect to their intent, unless somebody has been deceived by their acting or assuming to act as partners; and any such case must stand upon its peculiar facts, and upon special equities." See also Webb v. Johnson, 95 Mich. 330. We cite no other authorities, as the rule is elementary.

These defendants have never agreed to be partners, and have never held themselves out to plaintiff or to the world as such. By the purchase of stock, they became members of a body, organized under a law, which made its capital and assets alone liable for its debts. This is the legal entity—and it is immaterial what name you give it—with which plaintiff dealt, made contracts, and to which it gave credit. The statute contains not a sentence from which any individual or partnership liability can be inferred. Upon what principle of common sense, justice, or equity can it now be held that plaintiff, having trusted this entity, can recover its entire debt from one with whom it never contracted, and who never promised to pay? It is unnecessary to determine whether these associations are corporations under our Constitution, which provides that the term "corporations" "shall be construed to include all associations, and joint-stock companies having any of the powers or privileges of corporations not possessed by individuals or partnerships." Article 15, § 11. It is the established rule that those dealing with corporations are estopped to deny the lawful existence thereof, and cannot, therefore, hold the stockholders individually liable, unless such liability is imposed by the statute. This rule is based upon two grounds: (1) That it is against public policy to permit the existence of these corporations to be attacked collaterally in suits between them and others. It is reserved for the state alone to question their legal existence through its law department. (2) Because parties have dealt with it as a corporation, and not upon the faith of the individual liability of its stockholders. We see no reason why the doctrine of estoppel should not be applied in the one case as well as in the other. There is no difference in principle between the two. Each is a legal entity, whose sole warrant for existence is found in, and whose powers and liabilities are fixed by, statute. The doctrine of estoppel in this case need not, however, be based upon the determination of the question as to whether the Grand Rapids Storage & Transfer Company, Limited, was a corporation. If these defendants, in the absence of any statute, had associated themselves together upon the same terms as those provided by this statute, had limited their liability in the same manner and for the same amount, had furnished plaintiff with a copy of that agreement, and it had sold them goods, the law would not permit him to recover against them, either as individuals or as partners. It had dealt with them and trusted them upon the strength of their limited liability. It had agreed to look to this alone, and the law will hold it to its undertaking. This rule is founded in good morals, as well as good law. The policy of the law for partnership associations, limited, is to relax the common-law rule, to permit parties to limit their liability, and exempt themselves from a liability which may be ruinous. Whether the policy is wise or unwise is a question for the legislature, and not for the courts.

The injustice in sustaining the plaintiff's contention is manifest. The law, as construed by counsel for plaintiff, says to A who does not wish to actively engage in business, and be held responsible for its management: "You may invest $1,000 in the stock of one of these associations; and, although the law limits your liability to the amount of capital subscribed, still if there has been any defect, however innocently made, in the original articles of association, or in its subsequent management, you can be held liable for all the debts of the association." Such a rule is not founded in justice, common sense, sound logic, or good morals. Even in construing the statutes for the formation of limited partnership, no such harsh rule is always applied. Buck v. Alley, 145 N. Y. 488, 496. The law of Michigan prohibited a corporation from doing any business before filing its articles of association. A corporation was formed under this law, but, before it had completed its organization by filing its articles, its prudential committee purchased goods. Suit was brought against this committee, who were directors, based upon the personal liability of the members. The court, in deciding the case, said: "It seems to us entirely clear that both parties understood and meant that the contract was to be, and in fact was, with the corporation, and not with the defendants individually. The agreement thus made could not be afterwards changed by either of the parties without the consent of the other. Ulley v. Donaldson, 94 U. S. 29, 24 L. ed. 54. . . . The corporation having assumed by entering into the contract with the plaintiff to have the requisite power, both parties are estopped to deny it." Whitney v. Wyman, 101 U. S. 892, 396, 25 L. ed. 1050, 1051. See also American Mirror & Glass Beveling Co. v. Bulkeley, 107 Mich. 447.

We are aware that this decision is not in harmony with the decisions of the supreme court of Pennsylvania, but in so far as those decisions adopt the rigorous rule that the members of these associations are liable as partners because of some irregularity or defect in their organization or management, and thereby read into the statute a penalty which it does not impose, but which, by a fair construction of the statute, is excluded, we cannot follow them.

Other interesting and important questions are raised and ably discussed by counsel, but, inasmuch as the entire controversy is disposed of by the above opinion, we refrain from discussing them.

In one instance, in dealing with the plaintiff, the manager of this association omitted the word "Limited." No testimony was introduced on the part of plaintiff to show that any "indebtedness, damage, or liability" arose to it in consequence of this single act, and therefore no right of action from this cause was shown to exist.

The judgment is affirmed.

CONNECTICUT SUPREME COURT OF ERRORS.

GUARANTEE TRUST & SAFE-DEPOSIT COMPANY

v.

PHILADELPHIA, READING, & NEW ENGLAND RAILROAD COMPANY.
James K. O. SHERWOOD, Receiver, etc., Appl.

(69 Conn. 709.)

1. An appeal may be taken from an order directing a receiver to restore a schedule of wages to employees, although it is in the nature of a mere administrative direction which ordinarily lies within the discretion of the court, if the question of the power of the court to appropriate the funds in his hands for the purposes covered by the order is distinctly raised and decided.

NOTE.—For rights of receiver as to property outside the state in which he is appointed, see generally Gilman v. Hudson River Boat & Shoe Mfg. Co. (Wis.) 23 L. R. A. 52.

2. The jurisdiction of a state court which has appointed a railroad receiver to direct him as to the wages to be paid for operating the road within the state is not defeated by the fact that the employees in operating the road crossed the state boundary and incidentally performed some services in another state, although the receivership is ancillary to a receivership in such other state.

(November 2, 1907.)

APPEAL by the receiver of the Philadelphia, Reading, & New England Railroad Company from an order of the Superior Court for Hartford County directing him to restore the schedule of wages for operatives which had been in operation on the road and which he had changed to the detriment of the employees. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. Arthur L. Shipman and Charles E. Gross for appellant.

Messrs. Buck & Eggleston, for petitioners:

The statute of 1897, chapter 194, does not permit questions arising after final judgment has been rendered to be taken to this court for review.

In the case of corporations formed by the concurrent action of two states, or of consolidated lines operated by the same corporation in two states, it is held that a receiver appointed by the courts of one state may exercise jurisdiction over the property in both states; and the courts of the other state will yield all necessary aid to give and maintain the receiver's possession of the property.

8 Wood, Railway Law, p. 1655, §481; North-ern Indiana R. Co. v. Michigan C. R. Co. 56 U. S. 15 How. 233, 14 L. ed. 674.

But the fact that the property over which a receiver is sought is located partly in one state and partly in another, as in the case of a railway corporation whose line extends through two different states, the company being incorporated in both, will not prevent the courts of one of the states from appointing a receiver to take charge of the railway in a case otherwise appropriate for the relief.

High, Receivers, 2d ed. p. 40, § 44.

Property controlled need not be within the jurisdiction. Nor is the right to confer such authority to be questioned upon any theory that the receiver's power is limited to property found within the state where he is appointed; for it is not necessary that the property should be within the jurisdiction of the court.

20 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law, p. 66; Merchants' Nat. Bank v. McLeod, 38 Ohio St. 184.

The acts of the receiver in carrying out this proposed order within the state of New York would not be interfered with or disturbed by reason of the laws which, for a better name, has been termed "comity between statutes."

High, Receivers, 2d ed. p. 42, § 47.

In the following cases, wages of railroad employees have been required to be paid by receivers for services rendered both inside and outside of the jurisdictional lines of the courts making the decisions:

Ames v. Union P. R. Co. 62 Fed. Rep. 7, 4 Inters. Com. Rep. 619; Waterhouse v. Comer, 55 Fed. Rep. 149, 19 L. R. A. 403; Thomas v. Cincinnati, N. O. & T. P. R. Co. 62 Fed. Rep. 17; Continental Trust Co. v. Toledo, St. L. & K. C. R. Co. 59 Fed. Rep. 514; Frank v. Denver & R. G. R. Co. 23 Fed. Rep. 757; United States Trust Co. v. Omaha & St. L. R. Co. 63 Fed. Rep. 737; Chattanooga Terminal R. Co. v. Felton, 69 Fed. Rep. 273; Farmers' Loan & T. Co. v. Northern P. R. Co. 69 Fed. Rep. 871; Northern Indiana R. Co. v. Michigan C. R. Co. 56 U. S. 15 How. 233, 14 L. ed. 674.

Hamersley, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

This is an appeal by the receiver from an order of court directing him to restore the schedule of wages existing at the time of his appointment in respect to persons employed by him in operating the railroad in charge of the court. The order was made in response to a petition by Silas N. Smith and others, being the employees whose wages were reduced by the receiver; and the court ordered that the petitioners be made parties to the record for the purposes of the petition. Smith and others have filed in this court a plea in abatement, which we must consider before disposing of the appeal.

A question might have been raised as to the standing of these petitioners in this court. The superior court has the power to direct a receiver in respect to the wages to be paid in the management of a property under its charge. But it is a power to be exercised only in clear cases of necessity, and with exceeding caution. A main purpose of appointing a receiver is to remit to him those details of management which cannot well be administered by the court. Where plainly necessary, the power may be exercised either by an order establishing a schedule of wages or by the appointment of a receiver in whose discretion the court can place greater confidence. The court may act on the application of a receiver, or without any application. The situation may be such as to justify the employees of the receiver in bringing the subject to the attention of the court by an appropriate petition, and, if an investigation is deemed requisite, they may properly be heard. But that such petition and hearing, in a case like this, where no execution of an existing contract is sought to be enforced, but simply a direction as to the terms of future contracts, can make the proceeding an adversary one, in the legal sense, so that the petitioners are parties to the original action for the purpose of an adjudication, is by no means clear. Some decisions in Federal circuit courts seem to support the theory of a power in the court to determine upon complaint, pleadings, and trial, as in a judicial proceeding, all grievances suffered by the employees of a railroad receiver in the operation of a road. Continental Trust Co. v. Toledo, St. L. & K. C. R. Co. 59 Fed. Rep. 514, 517; Thomas v. Cincinnati, N. O. & T. P. R. Co. 62 Fed. Rep. 17, 18, and cases there cited. If these decisions go farther than a recognition of the admitted power of a court to adjudicate and enforce contracts its officer has made, and to direct his conduct as to the terms of those he shall make, they would seem to involve a power in court over all persons who may be employed by the receiver inconsistent with that individual freedom of action and contract deemed essential in all other relations. We express no opinion on this question. Although apparently involved, it has not been raised by the parties. In view of the final conclusion reached, it is of no practical importance in this case, and, under the special circumstances, may properly be treated as waived. Assuming, then, that the petitioners are entitled to appear as parties and file the plea in abatement, it follows that, for the purpose of disposing of this plea, the order appealed from must be regarded as a final adjudication of the rights of parties involved in a judicial proceeding of an adversary nature.

In the course of an action on the equity side of the court in which a receiver is appointed, it is often necessary for the court to make an order which constitutes an adjudication by a judicial finding, separable from the main action, affecting in some instances persons who are parties to the action only for the purposes of that proceeding, and which cannot be reviewed unless by an appeal from that order. Orders of such a character, which are in fact a final adjudication of the rights involved, may generally be reviewed by an appellate court. The reasons for the rule are well stated in Blossom v. Milwaukee & C. R. Co. 68 U. S. 1 Wall. 655, 17 L. ed. 678. Under our statute, when a party to such a final order thinks himself aggrieved by the decision of the court on any question of law arising in the trial, he may appeal and remove the question for review in this court. We have heretofore acted on this construction of the statute, and do not doubt its correctness. Leonard v. Charter Oak L. Ins. Co. 65 Conn. 529. Even in actions on the law side of the court, a "final judgment," within the meaning of our statute of appeal, may include a judgment in its nature final and separable from any other judgment that may be rendered in the action, although not finally disposing of the action. Bunnell v. Berlin Iron Bridge Co. 66 Conn. 24, 37. But it is claimed that the order in question is not final as to its subject matter: that it is a mere administrative direction, lying in the discretion of the court, and open to modification at any time. There may be orders of this nature which are not appealable, but without discussing the limits of that discretion which the court has in making a merely administrative order, we think in this case the receiver was entitled to appeal, because the question of jurisdiction, involving the power of the court to appropriate the funds of the estate for the purposes covered by the order, was distinctly raised and decided. The order thus becomes a final judgment in the case, determining the power of the court in the application of funds, and directly affecting the interest of parties to the main action. An appeal from a void order affecting the rights of owners and creditors who are represented by the receiver may be permitted under the general rules of chancery practice, and by the broad language of our statute in respect to receivers (Gen. Stat. §§ 1322, 1342). It is difficult to see how the receiver personally can be aggrieved by the present order; but we cannot say that, as representative of the defendant corporation and creditors, he may not be aggrieved, until the question of law involved is decided. The right of appeal does not depend upon an actual grievance, but on a belief that the decision of a question of law, which, if erroneous, may constitute a grievance, is erroneous. Possibly the insignificance of any effect the present order can have upon interests represented by the receiver might be pressed as sufficient ground for holding that in fact the appeal was taken by him personally, and not in any representative capacity. We think, however, the plea in abatement should be overruled.

The order appealed from relates solely to the wages of engineers and firemen employed by the receiver in running the engines used in operating the road in this state, under the direction of the superior court. Is the order, upon the facts appearing in the record, within the jurisdiction of that court? This is the only question of law presented by the appeal.

The material facts appearing in the record and found by the court below are as follows: The defendant corporation owned a railroad within the state of New York. It also was lessee of other railroads, including that belonging to the Hartford & Connecticut Western Railroad Company, a corporation incorporated under the laws of this state. The road belonging to the last-named corporation extends from Hartford, in this state, to Rhinecliff, in the state of New York, and constitutes the principal part of the railroad system of the defendant. The other roads owned and controlled by the defendant were operated in connection with the Hartford & Connecticut Western. On August 13, 1893, the supreme court of the state of New York, second judicial department, appointed Mr. James K. O. Sherwood receiver of the property and effects of the present defendant, upon application of the present plaintiff; and Mr. Sherwood has since operated some portion of the railroads owned and controlled by the defendant under the orders of said court. The parties to the action and the nature of the action in which the appointment was made and the terms of the order making the appointment do not appear. On October 28, 1893, Mr. Sherwood was appointed by the superior court for Hartford county receiver of the defendant corporation in the state of Connecticut. The nature of the action in which this appointment was made does not appear. On November 7, 1893, Mr. Sherwood, by virtue of the order of the superior court, took control of the defendant corporation and its leased lines in the state of Connecticut and is still managing and operating said railroads and said leased lines subject to the orders and direction of said court. The record is not clear as to the portions of the railroad operated under the controlling direction of the New York and Connecticut courts, respectively; but it must be taken as a fact found that the Hartford & Connecticut Western Railroad, in this state, has, since November 7, 1893, been operated by Mr. Sherwood, as receiver appointed by the superior court, in accordance with the directions of that court. Upon taking possession of the Connecticut road and property of every description belonging to the defendant, and having a situs in Connecticut, Mr. Sherwood found a schedule of wages existing in respect to the engineers and firemen employed in running the engines used in operating the road, and this schedule he followed until May 1, 1897, when (as appears by necessary implication), without any direction of the superior court or of the New York court, he altered the schedule, by reducing the amounts paid for each day's work. Upon this state of facts, the superior court passed the order in question, restoring the rates of pay, and directing Mr. Sherwood, as receiver of the defendant corporation, under appointment of the court, to pay the engineers and firemen in his employ, as such receiver, the same wages they had received previous to the reduction on May 1. It appears that, in operating the Connecticut road, some of its engines are run from places in this state to places in New York state, by the engineers and firemen employed by the Connecticut receiver, and to that extent the services rendered to the receiver in pursuance of that employment are actually performed within the territorial limits of New York; and it is on this ground, and on this ground alone, that it is claimed the order is void for want of jurisdiction.

It seems very plain that if the receiver, in operating the road, finds it necessary to send his employees into another state, he may do so, and the fact that he does so does not affect the jurisdiction of the court to direct them as to their wages. And it is equally clear that a receiver appointed in one state may be directed by the court of that state in respect to such matters in the operation of the road as must, for the interest of all concerned, follow one rule, although a portion of the line affected by the direction is situate in another state, in which he has also been appointed receiver of the same road. It is true that no court can enforce its orders beyond the territorial limits of its jurisdiction; but it is also true that, by a rule of comity, based in part upon paramount necessity, the authority of receivers appointed in one state will be recognized in many ways by the courts of another state within whose jurisdiction it may be exercised (Blake Crusher Co. v. New Haven, 46 Conn. 478; Cooke v. Orange, 48 Conn. 409); and that, ordinarily, a railroad receiver acting under appointment in different states in respect to the same property may be directed by the court of one state in respect to the management of the railroad under the charge of that court; and, if such direction affect portions of the line in other states where he is receiver, the courts of those states, where unity of action is essential to the best interests of all concerned, will refrain from any action interfering with the direction, or will aid its execution by an independent order. In such cases an order of court cannot be held void for want of jurisdiction, because the court may rely for its full enforcement upon an application of this rule of comity by the courts of another state. It appearing, therefore, as it clearly does by the record in this case, that the superior court is the court charged with the direct operation of the Hartford & Connecticut Western road in this state, which is the main part of the defendant's railroad system; that it is the proper court to direct the receiver in respect to the wages of the engineers and firemen employed in the operation of that road; that it is for the interest of all concerned that the employment of these engineers and firemen should include their services in running engines over those portions of the line in New York essential to the beneficial operation of the road by the court,—it follows that the superior court might properly rely upon such application of the rule of comity by the New York court as would aid, and not obstruct, the full effect of the order.

The receiver alleged that any changes in the wages by the superior court would conflict with the business of the road within the jurisdiction of the New York court. This allegation was in issue, and by its judgment the court has found the allegation untrue. The finding may be justified by the facts in the record. Mr. Sherwood was appointed receiver by both courts for the very purpose of preventing such conflict. For four years the receiver has operated the road without such conflict, under the very schedule the court now orders him to restore. Possibly some conflict might arise through the disobedience of the receiver or the failure of a court to apply the rules of comity, but these are contingencies not to be considered in framing the order. Assuming, as we must, upon this record (for it is found by the court, and admitted by all the parties), that the superior court was the proper court to make an order regulating the wages of those employed by the receiver in running the engines used in operating the Connecticut road, there was no error in making the order appealed from.

Our only doubt has been whether the court and all the parties before us have not erred in so conducting the proceedings as to make this assumption imperative; i. e., whether a full examination of all relevant facts might not show that the proper course was to seek the direction of the New York court in respect to the whole matter. That is the court of initial proceeding. The order appointing the receiver in Connecticut recites that he is appointed as ancillary to the receiver in New York, and without such recital, unless it otherwise distinctly appeared, he would, ordinarily, by force of the rule of comity, act as ancillary receiver. In matters of management in respect to a property impracticable or difficult to be managed otherwise than as a whole, the direction of the court of initial proceeding, establishing rules which of necessity must apply to the whole property, will ordinarily be followed by the courts appointing the same receiver in other states. But while the court in New York, as the court of initial proceeding, is presumptively the proper court to direct as to the wages of employees, whose services are rendered as a whole in both states, nevertheless it is possible that the interests of the property may require, and the nature of the proceedings in both courts justify, the direction of the Connecticut court as to the wages of these employees, and such is the condition shown by this record. If the record omits to present facts essential to the case of the appellant, this court can simply affirm the judgment. Schlesinger v. Chapman, 52 Conn. 271; Rogers v. Rogers, 58 Conn. 121, 150, 55 Am. Rep. 78.

As the record shows the primary and independent regulation of the wages of the engineers and firemen employed by the receiver in running the engines used in operating the Connecticut road is lawfully in the superior court, and it being evident that the services rendered in the course of their employment within the territorial limits of New York are a necessary incident to the principal employment, and that the treatment of the employment as a whole is essential to the beneficial operation of the road, the same rule of comity which would require the superior court to aid in enforcing the directions of the court of initial proceeding in respect to matters essential to its management of the property as a whole would require that court to recognize as binding on the receiver within its jurisdiction this order made in the administration of that portion of the management committed to the control of the superior court. The rules of comity may not be departed from unless, in certain cases, for the purpose of necessary protection of our own citizens, or of enforcing some paramount rule of public policy. Such considerations do not enter into the present case, and the limitations of an order passed for that purpose need not be discussed. Upon the facts appearing in the record, the order passed by the superior court is not void for want of jurisdiction, and must be obeyed. The plea in abatement is overruled.

There is no error in the order complained of.

KENTUCKY COURT OF APPEALS.

George W. DALE et al., Appts.,
v.
COMMONWEALTH of Kentucky.

(.....Ky.....)

The pardon of an accused whose bail bond has been forfeited for a departure from court contrary to the conditions of the bond does not affect the forfeiture.

(September 24, 1897.)

APPPEAL by defendants from a judgment of the Circuit Court for Lewis County holding them liable on a forfeited bail bond. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. George N. Thomas and W. B. Pugh, for appellants:

The pardon relates back to the offense itself, and terminates all proceedings uncompleted, and relieves from the effects of any proceedings completed that will tend to punish the accused for his offense in any manner direct or collateral.

The undertaking for which these appellants are sought to be amerced was and is one without the tinge or shadow of a consideration saving such as the law implies in such cases. Now, if there is no vested right in any person to any portion of the proceeds of a forfeiture here, what good reason can be advanced, legal, equitable, or moral, for insisting that notwithstanding the executive pardon and its pretty extensive effect, the innocent sureties should be required to contribute out of their property to the personal wealth of the various officers who might be entitled to share in a distribution of the proceeds of this forfeited bond upon a final judgment.

Com. v. Spraggins, 18 B. Mon. 514.

If a man be deprived or convicted or otherwise punished for an offense during a session of parliament, and at the same session an act pass which pardons the offense, it seem agreed that the conviction or deprivation, etc., are ipso facto avoided.

Strickland v. Thorpe, Yelv. 126; Re Deming, 10 Johns. 232; Diehl v. Rodgers, 169 Pa. 816.

On petition for rehearing.

Nothing can make a covenant several which is by its express terms made joint, and where the language of the covenant is ambiguous the interest of the parties will determine.

Parsons, Contr. pp. 12-15, notes.

A bond authorizedly entered into by principal and sureties is joint, and the liability thereon is joint, and consequently a remission in favor of one would operate in favor of all.

Ex parte Garland, 71 U. S. 4 Wall. 833, 19 L. ed. 866.

These sureties were deprived by the pardon of doing what they might otherwise have done; under § 93 of the Criminal Code they might have rearrested the accused, or he might have surrendered himself for sentence.

There was no way in which they could apply for the judicial remission, for arrest or surrender has been held essential to its exercise.

Little v. Com. 3 Bush, 22.

Mr. W. S. Taylor for appellee.

White, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

Azariah Dale was indicted by the grand jury of Lewis county for a felony, and, being permitted to give bail in the sum of $200 for his appearance to answer said charge in the Lewis circuit court, the appellants, Dale and Pollitt, became his sureties, with the usual covenants and conditions for the appearance of said Azariah Dale in the circuit court to answer said charge. At the September term, 1896, the case was called for trial, and a jury impaneled and sworn, and thereupon appellants appeared, and consented to remain bound on the bond during trial; and about the time the case was concluded the said accused, Azariah Dale, departed from the court. Whereupon the said Azariah Dale was solemnly called, and, failing to answer, an order was made forfeiting his bail bond, and summons awarded against appellants as his sureties, which was duly issued and executed, and at the next term of the Lewis circuit court judgment was rendered on said bond for the sum of $200, the amount of the bond; and from that judgment this appeal is prosecuted, and a reversal is asked. The name of the accused, Azariah Dale, is not signed to the bail bond, nor does he in that bond undertake to do anything, but the sole undertaking is by appellants. The forfeiture of the bail bond was taken September 9, 1896; and on the 18th day of the same month the acting governor issued and delivered to the said Azariah Dale, accused, a full and complete pardon for said offense, and restoring him to all privileges of citizenship. This pardon the appellants, Dale and Pollitt, pleaded and relied on as a bar to any recovery on said bail bond by reason of any order forfeiting same. This plea the circuit court adjudged bad on demurrer, and, appellants failing to plead further, judgment was rendered.

The question of the extent and effect to be given to a pardon issued by the governor to an accused, as it affects a forfeited bail bond or recognizance, has never been before this court, and able counsel has not been able to furnish us with any direct authority in this state. This question, however, was before the supreme court of Kansas in the case of Weatherwax v. State, 17 Kan. 428. In that case the sureties had pleaded as a defense to a recovery on the forfeited bail bond of the accused a full pardon issued by the governor of the state of Kansas. The court says: "Nor can we see how a pardon could reach a matter wholly independent of the criminal offense charged, or of the punishment therefor. Even if the defendant had been acquitted on the criminal charge, still this action on the forfeited recognizance might be maintained." In the case of State v. Davidson, 20 Mo. 212, 61 Am. Dec. 603, cited in 8 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law, p. 716, the supreme court of Missouri held that the liability of principal and surety in a recognizance is several, and not joint; and a remission by the governor, after forfeiture, in favor of the principal, does not discharge the surety. We cannot see how it can be that the pardon issued to the accused, Azariah Dale, can affect the forfeiture of the bond of the appellants. The appellants had covenanted to have the accused present when required by the court. The accused was in their custody, in law, at the time he left the court-house, and his bond forfeited, and no reason is given why he so departed. Appellants' counsel contend that, by the pardon of the governor, the same related and had the effect to cancel the forfeiture of the bail bond, and made the accused a new creature, as if born again. In the case of Mount v. Com. 2 Duv. 95, Judge Robertson, in commenting on the pardon of Mount, says: "The pardon relieved the convict of the entire penalty incurred by the offense pardoned, and nothing else or more," and approved the judgment of conviction, by which Mount was given a greater penalty by reason of the second offense notwithstanding the first offense was pardoned. We are of opinion the pardon issued to the accused did not have the effect to relieve the bail. That question was entirely in the discretion of the circuit judge who tried the case. No reason is given why the accused left the court while being tried, and no statement is made to the court negating, at least, the idea that his departure was with appellants' consent and knowledge.

Wherefore the judgment of the Circuit Court is affirmed.

Rehearing denied.

Adolph SCHMIDT, Trustee, etc., Impleaded with Northern Division of Cumberland & Ohio Railroad Company, Appt.,
v.

LOUISVILLE & NASHVILLE RAILROAD COMPANY et al.

(.....Ky.....)

1. A company which purchases all the property and rights of another railroad company, including a lease, and which takes charge of the leased road, operates it for a long time, and elects to sue and recover money due the lessee from the lessor, must be held to have assumed the obligations of the lease, and not to be a mere tenant by sufferance.
2. A trustee for the bondholders of a railroad company has a right to maintain an action for the enforcement of a contract leasing the road for the benefit of the bondholders.
3. An abandonment of a railroad lease by a company which has acquired the lessee's property and rights is not authorized by the mere failure of the lessor to pay money due under the lease when the contract gives the lessee a lien therefor, and does not provide that it shall be a ground of forfeiture, although there are other conditions of forfeiture expressed.
4. A railroad lease is not so uncertain and indefinite that it cannot be specifically performed where a fair construction of it will authorize such an operation of the road as the business interests of the community may require.
5. The operation of a railroad for a term of years under a lease may be required by mandatory injunction compelling the specific performance of the contract of lease.
6. The mere fact that a contract having a number of years to run may turn out a losing investment affords no reason for refusing specifically to enforce it.
7. A contract fair when made may be specifically performed, although it has become a hard one by force of subsequent circumstances or changing events.

(June 15, 1897.)

APPEAL by plaintiff from a judgment of the Circuit Court for Shelby County refusing to compel defendants to operate the Northern Division of the Cumberland & Ohio Railroad under a contract by which they were alleged to have leased it and undertaken to operate it. Reversed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Mr. G. G. Gilbert, for Northern Division of Cumberland & Ohio Railroad Company:

The charter granted by the state to the Northern Division of the Cumberland & Ohio Railroad Company is not only a contract, but it presents three contracts:

1. It is a contract between the state and the corporation.
2. It is a contract between the corporation and each and every stockholder of that corporation.
3. It is a contract between the state and each and every stockholder of this corporation.

NOTE.—For specific performance of contract to run street railway, see Prospect Park & C. I. R. Co. v. Coney Island & B. R. Co. (N. Y.) 20 L. R. A. 610.

Cook, Stock & Stockholders, §§ 493, 665.

The purpose of the organization of this corporation is to construct and operate a railroad. This is a public highway, in which the state at large, and the counties through which it passes, and the public generally, are both concerned and deeply interested.

Union P. R. Co. v. Chicago, R. I. & P. R. Co. 163 U. S. 564, 41 L. ed. 265.

During the period of thirty years the lessee stands in the shoes of the lessor, and is in full possession of all of this property and of these franchises.

This lessee therefore for the period of thirty years assumes the duties and obligations growing out of the charter, and out of the triple contract created between the state, the corporation, and the stockholders, above named.

When the defendant, the Louisville & Nashville Railroad Company, acquires by purchase, by conduct, or otherwise, the property and franchises of the original lessee, it necessarily assumes the shoes of that lessee, and becomes in fact the lessee itself.

During the existence of this lease, the Louisville & Nashville Railroad Company stands as much bound to respect these contract obligations, as the original corporation under the charter.

Guif, C. & S. F. R. Co. v. Newell, 78 Tex. 834; Louisville & N. R. Co. v. Smith, 87 Ky. 501.

A railroad company has no right to abandon a public highway of this kind without the consent of the state.

State, Lessee, v. Atchison & N. R. Co. 24 Neb. 143; Noll v. Dubuque, B. & M. R. R. Co. 83 Iowa, 66; Lake Erie & W. R. Co. v. Griffin, 107 Ind. 464; People v. Albany & V. R. Co. 24 N. Y. 261, 83 Am. Dec. 295; Atty. Gen. v. West Wisconsin R. Co. 36 Wis. 466; People v. Northern R. Co. 53 Barb. 98.

To permit the lessee to abandon this lease is to permit one party to the contract to confiscate or destroy this valuable property without the consent of the other party.

Ferguson v. Meredith, 68 U. S. 1 Wall. 25, 17 L. ed. 604; Knorrville v. Knorrville & O. R. Co. 22 Fed. Rep. 758; Orr v. Bracken County, 81 Ky. 593; Cook, Stock & Stockholders, § 500.

It is the policy of the law to shield this defendant from being harassed by numerous suits when the remedy can be reached in one action.

10 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law, pp. 975, 976, notes 5, 6, pp. 977, 978.

Equity will restrain any corporation as well as any citizen from interfering with a bridge, which is a part of a public highway.

Pittsburg & W. E. Pass. R. Co. v. Point Bridge Co. 165 Pa. 87.

Even a mandatory injunction will issue to force any company or any citizen to remove obstructions from a highway.

A mandatory injunction will be granted against a railroad company to compel it to perform the covenants of a lease, and to operate its trains.

Chicago & A. R. Co. v. New York, L. E. & W. R. Co. 24 Fed. Rep. 516; Coe v. Louisville & N. R. Co. 3 Fed. Rep. 775; Toledo, A. A. & N. M. R. Co. v. Pennsylvania Co. 54 Fed. Rep. 730, 19 L. R. The fact that the defendant had been in possession of and operating this road for so many years is an estoppel against its denying the existence of the lease.

Joy v. St. Louis, 138 U. S. 1, 34 L. ed. 843. A specific performance of this contract should be ordered, and such a remedy is not beyond the machinery of the court.

Joy v. St. Louis, 138 U. S. 1, 34 L. ed. 843; Chicago, R. I. & P. R. Co. v. Union P. R. Co. 47 Fed. Rep. 16; Re Omaha Bridge Cases, 10 U. S. App. 98, 51 Fed. Rep. 309, 2 C. C. A. 174; Thomas v. West Jersey R. Co. 101 U. S. 71, 25 L. ed. 950; Phillips v. Window, 18 B. Mon. 448, 68 Am. Dec. 729.

The damages sustained by the plaintiff by stopping the operation of this road cannot be accurately estimated, and are therefore in legal technology irreparable.

Measrs. Simrall, Bodley, & Doolan, William S. Pryor, J. C. Beckam, and William Beckam for appellant.

Measrs. Helm & Bruce and W. H. Bruce, for appellees:

Equity will not undertake to enforce specific performance of such a contract as the one alleged by the plaintiffs.

The particular contract in question is too uncertain and indefinite, as to the obligation of the defendant to operate the road in question, to be specifically enforced.

In the contract sued on there is certainly no express obligation on the part of the Louisville, Cincinnati, & Lexington Railway Company, the lessee, to operate the road of the lessor at all. If there is any obligation of this character it is only an implied one. And it is by no means certain that an obligation to this effect can be implied.

The contract contains no specification or details as to how the road is to be operated, but leaves that entirely to the discretion and judgment of the lessee.

For the court to solemnly decree that the lessee shall specifically perform the obligation of this contract by operating this railroad seems almost an absurdity. The contract does not say how it shall be operated.

The contract in question, accepting the appellant's construction of it, is a contract calling for the rendition of continuous services, requiring the exercise of skill and judgment, and is of a character which a court of equity will not attempt to specifically enforce, even if it were more definite and certain than it is.

Even if the contract were one which a court of equity will undertake to enforce specifically, plaintiffs in the case at bar have not shown themselves entitled to the relief prayed.

The lessor railroad company, the Cumberland & Ohio Railroad Company, has no standing in a court of equity to ask that the lessee be compelled to continue the operation of the road under this lease, under which the lessor is over $400,000 in default to the lessee.

A court will not enforce the specific performance of this obligation by the lessee in behalf of these bondholders, even though they may not themselves be in any default; for it is plain that the court cannot enforce the specific performance of the entire contract.

to the ordinary common-law action for damages for breach of contract.

Chicago & V. R. Co. v. Fosdick, 106 U. S. 68, 27 L. ed. 54.

Guffy, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

This action was brought in the Shelby circuit court by appellant, Schmidt, trustee, and the Northern Division of the Cumberland & Ohio Railroad Company, against the Louisville & Nashville Railroad Company, etc., to compel said Louisville & Nashville Railroad Company, by mandatory injunction, to continue to operate the Northern Division of the Cumberland & Ohio Railroad, from Shelbyville to Bloomfield, in accordance with a lease and contract set out in the petition. It appears from the allegations of the petition that the Northern Division of the Cumberland & Ohio Railroad Company, in 1879, leased to the Louisville, Cincinnati, & Lexington Railway Company its road from Eminence to Bloomfield, as set out in the lease, which reads as follows:

Lease of C. & O. to L., C. & L. Ry. Co.

This indenture of a lease made and entered into by and between the Northern Division of the Cumberland & Ohio Railroad Company, of the first part, and the Louisville, Cincinnati & Lexington Railway Company, of the second part, both railroad corporations duly organized under the laws of the state of Kentucky, witnesseth: That for and in consideration of $1 cash in hand by the party of the second part, and in consideration of the mutual covenants and stipulations hereinafter contained, the said party of the first part does hereby lease to the said party of the second part all that part of the first party's unfinished roadbed, right of way, with improvements and appurtenances, depots, and depot grounds, machinery, tools, and implements, together with all its property, rights, and franchises, including unpaid subscriptions to capital stock, dues, and demands belonging to or in any wise appertaining to the said first party's line of railway at the town of Eminence, Kentucky, thence southwardly, through a portion of Henry county, and the counties of Shelby and Spencer, and to Bloomfield, in the county of Nelson and the state of Kentucky, for the period of thirty years from the date of full execution hereof, upon the terms, conditions, and stipulations hereinafter set out:

(1) Under direction of the stockholders of said first party, its president and directors will execute a mortgage upon all the property, rights, and franchises belonging to or in any wise appertaining to said first party's line of road hereinbefore described, for the security of $350,000 of mortgage coupon bonds, having twenty years to run, and bearing interest at the rate of 7 per cent per annum, interest payable on the 1st days of June and December of each year, all of which is fully set out in said mortgage. Now, said bonds and coupons are to be fully prepared, signed, and countersigned, and made ready for use, as in the charter of said first party and said mortgage provided, and the same will be delivered to said second party within sixty days after the delivery of this lease.

(2) Said second party hereby binds and obliges itself that said bonds, or proceeds of such as are sold, shall be used by it in the construction of said first party's line of railway, as provided in this lease, and for no other purpose whatever. It is agreed that enough of said bonds may be sold or used in and about contracts for work, labor, or materials to complete said line of railway, at not less than — cents to the dollar; and whatever of said bonds or proceeds, after deducting all sums due said second party, may not be so used, shall, after said completion, after cancelation of bonds, be turned over to said first party, and such surplus bonds destroyed.

(3) A fundamental condition of this lease is that if said second party shall not be able to dispose of bonds amounting at their face value to $250,000, the proceeds to be in money, material, or labor, by or before the 1st day of September, 1880, then this lease terminates, and the parties hereto are released, and said second party is to restore to said first party all bonds: provided, however, that no absolute sale of any of said bonds shall be made by said second party unless and until it can place not less than two hundred and fifty thousand dollars in the value thereof in money or its equivalent; and, when that quantity of said bonds has been disposed of by said second party, it shall as soon as practicable, and not later than the 1st day of September, 1880, begin the construction of said first party's said line of railway, and a failure to begin work within said time shall operate as a termination of this lease. Whenever said $250,000 of said bonds shall have been disposed of as aforesaid, this contract becomes absolute and binding on the parties hereto, and the construction of said line of railway from Eminence to Bloomfield shall be commenced; and, when the construction of said line of railroad is begun, the same shall be pushed to completion as rapidly as possible; and a failure on the part of the party of the second part to so complete the same as to allow the safe and regular passage of trains to and from Eminence and Bloomfield within two years from the commencement of work thereon shall, at the option of said first party, after six months' notice of its election so to do, operate as a forfeiture of this lease. None of said bonds shall be sold with past-due coupons annexed thereto; but, before selling, all past-due coupons shall be cut off, canceled, and returned by said second party to said first party.

(4) When commenced, said construction shall be pushed as rapidly as possible, with due regard to the greatest economy; and the work and superstructure is to be as for a first-class single track railway, with the same gauge as the track of said second party's line of railway.

(5) It is further agreed that said second party shall furnish all necessary locomotive engines and rolling stock to operate said line of railway; and for the use of same said second party is to receive, out of the gross earnings of said first party's line of road, the cost of wear and tear to such engines and rolling stock as may be so furnished. But the first party reserves the right to furnish all or so much as it can of said rolling stock, and, when so furnished, said first party shall receive the same compensation therefor as is received by said second party on its rolling stock used on said line.

(6) It is further agreed and understood that, in the operation of said line of railway, said second party will make to said first party quarterly returns, giving full details of earnings and operating expenses, including the expense of keeping roadbed in order; and the net profits arising therefrom shall be applied to the payment of interest, and providing for sinking fund, and retiring said mortgage bonds. But out of the gross earnings shall be first deducted annually the sum of $1,000, which shall be paid to said first party, with which to pay the expense of keeping up its organization; and, if the net earnings do not prove sufficient to pay the interest and provide for the sinking fund on said mortgage bonds, then said second party, if all other sources of raising money of said first party prove insufficient, will supply the deficiency, so far as it may be done, by appropriating the net earnings, or so much as may be needed, on its own line, which may accrue by reason of business coming to it from or over said first party's line. This pledge and assignment shall be made effectual by mortgage properly executed, acknowledged, and recorded; and should it become necessary to use any of the net earnings on the lines of the second party to pay said interest and sinking fund, or any part of either, then all amounts so used, as well as all moneys paid for said first party by said second party, shall be treated as interest-bearing debts, interest at the same rate with said mortgage bonds, payable half-yearly, and to run from date of such payments, the debt and interest to be repaid out of said net earnings thereafter accruing to said first party on its own line, which may be so appropriated consistently with the other provisions of this lease; and, for all sums or any sums of money that may become due from said first party to said second party on its or any account, a lien is hereby created upon all the property, rights, and franchises of said first party owned or to be acquired in favor of said second party, to stand next in priority to said mortgage and bonds for $350,000 as aforesaid. But said second party shall not enforce the collection of said debts, or any of them, by enforcement of said lien, until at least eight years have elapsed from and after the date of the creation of the same.

(7) It is further agreed and understood that whenever the net earnings from the leased premises shall be sufficient to pay off the interest and sinking fund on said mortgage bonds for $350,000, or such portion thereof as is outstanding, and to repay said second party all dues and demands then due or owing, the surplus net earnings, unless used in retiring said bonds, as provided in said mortgage, less one tenth thereof, shall be paid over to said first party, the one tenth of said net earnings to be retained by said second party for its own use.

(8) It is further agreed and understood that, so long as said second party may operate said leased line of railway, no greater rate of charges, either for freight or passage thereon, shall be demanded or received, under its regular tariff, on its own lines of railway for local freight and passage.

(9) It is further agreed and understood that said first party assigns, transfers, and sets over to said second party all claims, dues, and demands, choses in action, unpaid subscriptions to capital stock (except private subscriptions and all evidences thereof), of every kind and character, to be by said second party collected by suit or otherwise, with power to settle, compromise, arbitrate, or adjust as to it may seem best; but this assignment and transfer does not become absolute (except to so much thereof as may be necessary to refund and indemnify to said second party the cost of printing and issuing said mortgage bonds, or incidental thereto, which is absolute) until said second party give notice in writing to the president of said first party that said $250,000 of said mortgage bonds have been disposed of as hereinbefore provided; and then and after such notice said second party may at once proceed as provided under the clause of this lease.

(10) It is further agreed and understood that this lease is not assignable without the consent of the grantor; that, during the existence of said lease, the second party will pay all taxes lawfully assessed against said leased premises, the amount thereof to be charged to operating expenses; and, at the termination thereof, said leased premises shall be restored to said first party in good repair, unless the same be extended or renewed by mutual consent, or unless prevented by unavoidable casualty, legal proceedings, or operation of law.

(11) The second party hereby agrees to furnish any means necessary to complete said first party's line of road from Eminence to Bloomfield, which may not be derived from the sale of the bonds to be issued by said first party, and also to furnish any means necessary to pay any interest which may become due on said mortgage bonds previous to the completion of said first party's line of road, which may not be derived from the earnings of said line of road. Any means so furnished by said second party is to become a lien debt due to said second party by said first party, and payable upon the same terms and conditions as hereinbefore provided as to the other indebtedness.

(12) If said second party be hindered or delayed in beginning or completing said line of railway by act or omission of said first party, or by legal or equitable proceedings, then the period or periods of such delay shall not be counted as part of the time within which said second party is to do or perform any acts or things under this contract.

In testimony whereof, the said second party, acting under authority and approval of its stockholders, duly had in stockholders' meeting assembled, on the 24th day of June, 1879, has caused these presents to be signed in duplicate, in its corporate name, by its president, and countersigned by its secretary, and its corporate seal hereto affixed; and the said second party, acting under authority and approval of its stockholders, duly had in stockholders' meeting assembled, on the 28th day of July, 1879, has caused these presents to be signed in duplicate in its corporate name, by its president, and countersigned by its secretary, and its corporate seal hereto affixed, this — day of —, 1879.

It will be seen from said lease that it first contemplated building the road from Eminence to Bloomfield, but afterwards the contract was modified, as shown by the contract, which reads as follows:

Modification of Lease.

This contract, made and entered into by and between the Northern Division of the Cumberland & Ohio Railroad Company, of the first part, and the Louisville, Cincinnati, & Lexington Railway Company, party of the second part (both railway corporations duly incorporated under the laws of the state of Kentucky), and Joshua F. Speed, trustee, party of the third part, witnesseth: That for and on account of the difficulties of carrying into effect the contract of the parties of the first and second parts hereto, in relation to the lease, construction, and operation of said first party's proposed line of railway from Eminence to Bloomfield, of date the 28th day of July, 1879, said parties have and do hereby agree upon the following changes and modifications of said contract and the mortgage therein named, to take effect when and as soon as this change and modification shall have been duly and properly approved by a majority of the stockholders of each of said companies, and fully executed and recorded in the proper offices, when, to all intents and purposes, the said contract so amended and modified shall be regarded and taken as the true contract and agreement between the parties hereto.

(1) Whenever said second party shall be able to dispose of said mortgage bonds provided for in said contract and mortgage, amounting at their face value to the sum of $150,000 (one hundred and fifty thousand dollars), and said bonds numbered from 1 to 150, inclusive, the proceeds in money, labor, or materials, the same may be done; and then this contract as amended, and in all its particulars, becomes absolute, and the construction of that portion of said first party's line of railway between Shelbyville and Bloomfield shall be commenced and pushed to completion as rapidly as possible; and a failure to complete said road so as to permit the safe and regular passage of trains between Shelbyville and Bloomfield within two years from the commencement of the work thereon shall, at the option of said first party, after six months' notice thereof, operate as a forfeiture of said lease; but no disposition of any of said bonds shall be made until not less in amount than $150,000 (one hundred and fifty thousand dollars) of the face value thereof, numbered as aforesaid, can be placed for money or its equivalent.

(2) Not more than $250,000 (two hundred and fifty thousand dollars) of the face value of said bonds, numbered from 1 to 250, inclusive, shall be used or disposed of in and about the construction of said railroad between Shelbyville and Bloomfield, and $100,000 (one hundred thousand dollars) of the face value of said bonds, numbered from 251 to 350, both inclusive, shall be set apart and faithfully preserved in such manner as the board of directors of the first and second parties may agree, for the ultimate construction of said first party's road between Eminence and Shelbyville; but said second party shall not be bound to begin the construction or operation of said last named portion of said railroad until, in the judgment of the board of directors of the said second party, the operation of the same would result in sufficient earnings to pay operating expenses and interest and sinking fund on the amount required to complete the same; and the mortgage heretofore made to Joshua F. Speed, trustee therein, is hereby so modified that the said 250 bonds to be used in constructing said railroad between Shelbyville and Bloomfield shall constitute no lien on that part of said company's road between Eminence and Shelbyville, until said 100 bonds set apart for its construction shall have been used for that purpose, and then all of said bonds issued shall be a joint and equal lien on the whole property, as set out in the original mortgage; and the said Speed, as trustee, is made a third party hereto, and shall sign this contract as evidence of his consent to the modification in this respect of the said mortgage. It being agreed and understood that at this date none of the said mortgage bonds have been sold or disposed of, but remain in the hands of the said second party; provided that, unless the second party shall complete the construction of so much of said first party's road as lies between Shelbyville and Eminence within five years from the 1st of September, 1880, then the lease of said last-named part of said road shall determine and terminate, at the option of said first party, after six months' notice; and, in the event of such termination of the lease, said bonds, numbered from 251 to 350, both inclusive, as aforesaid, and the coupons thereof, shall at once be canceled, so as to prevent their circulation, or, if the boards of the parties aforesaid so order it, they shall be destroyed.

(3) Before any of said bonds, numbered from 1 to 250, both inclusive, shall be sold or disposed of, each shall have a printed or lithographed indorsement thereon, to the effect that none of them or their coupons have any lien upon the company's property or franchise or line of road from north of Shelbyville until the one hundred bonds aforesaid are issued or used, and that portion of said road between Shelbyville and Eminence shall have been completed, and then all of said bonds and coupons shall have a common and joint lien on the whole property.

(4) The boards of directors of the first and second parties may agree to the use of second-hand rails to be sufficient for the safe transmission of trains, and to be removed and replaced as fast as they become unsafe. The price of said second hand rails to be agreed upon by said boards before being used.

(5) In all respects in which this contract is inconsistent with the original contract or mortgage, said originals are abrogated, and the contract as modified and amended by this agreement shall be taken as the true existing contract between the parties.

In testimony whereof, the said first and second parties, acting under directions of their respective stockholders, have each caused this contract to be signed with their corporate names and seals annexed by their respective presidents, and countersigned by the secretaries, and also duly signed by the said Joshua F. Speed.

Mortgage of C. & O. R. Co.

This indenture, made and entered into this the 2d day of July, in the year of our Lord 1879, between the Northern Division of the Cumberland & Ohio Railroad Company, a corporation duly organized under the laws of the state of Kentucky, party of the first part, and Joshua F. Speed, as trustee, party of the second part, witnesseth: That for and in consideration of $1 cash in hand paid by the party of the second part to the party of the first part; and whereas, it is provided in the charter of said party of the first part that it might issue mortgage bonds to complete its road, to the extent of $15,000 per mile, upon all its property, rights, and franchises; and whereas, the stockholders and board of directors of said first party have determined to issue such mortgage bonds to the extent of $350,000, bearing interest at the rate of 7 per cent per annum, interest payable half-yearly, and bonds being of even date with the said mortgage, and to be paid at the end of twenty years from their dates, and have determined that such mortgage shall be executed and bonds issued by minutes duly entered upon their record books, and have directed the preparation of said bonds, and the same have been prepared, aggregating the said sum of $350,000, and divided into bonds of the denomination of $1,000 each, making 350 bonds, numbered from 1 to 350, both inclusive, and lettered A; all of said bonds have interest coupons annexed thereto, to fall due on the 1st day of June and December of each year, interest and principal payable in the city of New York; and the said bonds have been duly executed, and are now about to be delivered, for the purpose of being sold, in order to complete their line of railway as specified in the lease this day made, from said Northern Division of the Cumberland & Ohio Railroad Company to the Louisville, Cincinnati, & Lexington Railway Company:

Now, therefore, for the equal security of each of said bonds at maturity, and the payment thereon of interest as the same matures, the said first party has this day bargained and sold, and does hereby bargain, sell, and convey, unto the said party of the second part, all the property, rights, and franchises of the said Northern Division of the Cumberland & Ohio Railroad Company, including all the right, title, and interest of said company, free from all liens, mortgages, or claims of any kind, and in and to its line of railroad, from its point of intersection with the line of road of said Louisville, Cincinnati, & Lexington Railway Company, in the town of Eminence, and the county of Henry, and state of Kentucky, through the counties of Henry, Shelby, and Spencer, and to Bloomfield, in Nelson county, Kentucky, together with all its improvements and appurtenances, right of way, lands adjacent thereto, machinery, tools, implements, fixtures, furniture, and materials, and supplies of every description, so as to vest in the said party of the second part all the right, title, and interest of the said Northern Division of the Cumberland & Ohio Railroad Company in and to all the property owned by it, or in which it has any interest at the date of the execution of this instrument, or hereafter to be acquired by the said first party. To have and to hold the same to the said party of the second part, his successors and assigns, forever. It is expressly to be understood, and is hereby declared to be the true intent and meaning of these presents, that the said second party shall have and hold the premises hereby granted or covenanted so to be, as trustee, for the joint and equal benefit and security of all such persons as may hereafter become the legal holders of any of the bonds aforesaid, and for the security of the principal and interest of each of said bonds, without regard to the time at which the said holders may become possessed thereof; provided, always, that the said first party, its lessees or assigns, shall have and retain exclusive possession, control, and management of said premises until default made as hereinafter provided, and possession taken in consequence thereof, and may, with the approval and concurrence of said second party, sell or lease and make conveyance of any portion of said premises which may be found unnecessary to the workings of said road, the proceeds of such sale being reinvested in other real estate, subject to the same trust, or in liquidation of so much of the bonds issued hereunder; such reinvestment being made also with the approbation of said second party but without the purchaser being required to look to the reinvestment; and provided, further, that if said party shall well and truly pay the several instalments of interest on said bonds, and each of them, as the same shall become due, then this indenture shall become void and of no further effect.

In the event of the failure of said first party to pay any part of any instalment of said interest for more than sixty days after the same shall have become due and been demanded at the place where the said interest shall be properly payable, or in the event of its failure to pay any portion of said principal for more than ninety days after the same shall have become due and payable, and been demanded at the place where same shall be payable, then and in either event, it shall and may be lawful for the said second party, and his successors in the trust hereby created, upon request thereto made in writing by any person holding any of said bonds, in the payment of principal or interest of which default shall have been made as aforesaid, to enter upon and take possession of the railroad, property, and franchises hereby granted or covenanted so to be, and to hold, use, operate, and manage the same for the joint and equal benefit of all the holders of said bonds. And upon such default, and request made and possession taken, the profits arising from the operation and use of the premises shall be appropriated by the party of the second part as follows, to wit: (1) To the payment of the expenses of the trust, including a fair and reasonable compensation to the trustee for his services. (2) If there be any surplus remaining, then to the payment of the interest in arrears on said bonds. (3) If there be still a surplus, then to the payment of the accruing interest on said bonds as it falls due, and to the payment of the principal of said bonds as it shall fall due. But in the event that, after such default and request made and possession taken, it shall become necessary or desirable to sell the premises in order to the more prompt payment of the interest and principal of said bonds, then it shall and may be lawful for said second party (upon request made in writing by persons legally holding said bonds to the extent of a majority of the bonds outstanding) to sell the said premises to the highest bidder, upon such terms as, not being inconsistent with this indenture, or the tenor or effect thereof, may be determined on by said second party and the person or persons holding said bonds. Said sale may be made for the whole amount of the principal and interest then accrued upon the whole issue of said bonds outstanding, treating the principal as become due by reason of the default in the payment of interest. And the whole purchase money may be required to be paid by the purchaser in the payments not less favorable to him than one third in cash, and the remainder in one and two years from day of sale, with interest from said day; or the purchaser may be required only to pay in like brief periods the interest then accrued and in arrears, and to secure the payment of the principal and accruing interest as they shall become due. But in any sale which may be made a lien shall be retained on the premises to secure the unpaid purchase money, and there shall likewise be reserved a power of resale in case of default in the payment of the purchase money. Said sale shall be made in the city of Louisville, and notice of the time, place, and terms of sale shall first have been given by public advertisement for at least four months in one or more newspapers published in each of the cities of Louisville, Lexington, Cincinnati, and New York. The money arising from any such sale shall be applied (1) to the payment of any interest which may be in arrears upon said bonds, and the expenses of executing the trust, including herein a fair and reasonable compensation to the trustee for his services; (2) to pay the principal of said bonds, or, if there be not sufficient to pay them in full, then to their payment pro rata. And, on such sale being made, it shall and may be lawful for said second party, by the execution of all needful and proper instruments of conveyance, to vest in the purchaser the full and perfect title to the premises, subject only to the lien and power of resale aforesaid. And said first party does hereby covenant to and with said second party, his successors and assigns, that it will, on reasonable request thereto, make, do, and execute such other and further deeds of conveyance and assurance of the premises, and particularly of the property, rights, and franchises hereafter to be acquired by them, as to the said second party, his successors and assigns, shall seem necessary and proper fully to effectuate the true meaning and intent of this indenture. And it does further covenant to and with the said second party, his successors, etc., that it will annually, commencing not later than the 1st day of January, 1883, appropriate from the earnings of said road a sum not less than $5,000, which sum shall be annually expended in the purchase and redemption of said bonds, or in the purchase of other interest-bearing securities approved by said second party, so as to form a sinking fund for the payment of the principal of said bonds when it shall become due.

It is further agreed and understood that said first party, or its lessee or assigns, shall have the option, at any time after the 1st of January, 1888, to redeem and take up said bonds, or any of them, by paying par and accrued interest to date of notice of redemption therefor. If election is made so to redeem, notice thereof shall be sufficient if given by advertisement in some daily newspaper published in the city of Louisville for thirty days; and, after the expiration of said thirty days the bonds called for and the sums due as interest shall cease to bear interest. But said bonds shall be called for in the order of their numbers, beginning at number 1, and following in numerical order. In order to the identification of the bonds whose payment it is intended hereby to secure, it is now declared that they shall each be sealed with the corporate seal of said first party, attested by the signature of the president, and countersigned by its secretary, and each certified on its face by the second party or his successor to be one of the issue intended to be protected.

And it is further agreed by and between the parties to this indenture that in the event of the death, resignation, or failure or refusal to act of the said second party, trustee, as aforesaid, then it shall and may be lawful for the Shelby circuit court, upon the application of the parties holding said bonds to the amount of $70,000 or more, to appoint a trustee or trustees in lieu and stead of said second party; and the trustee or trustees so appointed shall thereupon succeed to and be vested with all rights, powers, and privileges which are by this indenture conferred upon said second party, or intended so to be.

In testimony of all which, the said party of the first part, by its president and board of directors, and in pursuance to action of its stockholders duly had, has caused these presents to be sealed with its corporate seal, and signed with its corporate name, and countersigned by its secretary, this 2d day of July, 1879.

This indenture of mortgage, made and entered into by and between the Louisville, Cincinnati, & Lexington Railway Company, a railway corporation under the laws of the state of Kentucky, party of the first part, and Joshua F. Speed, as trustee, party of the second part, witnesseth: That whereas, by authority of an act of the general assembly of the commonwealth of Kentucky, approved the 18th day of March, A. D., 1878, the party of the first part has entered into a contract with the Northern Division of the Cumberland & Ohio Railroad Company for the lease, construction, and operation of the latter company's line of road from Eminence, in Henry county, Kentucky, though a part of said county and the counties of Shelby, Spencer, and into Nelson county, as far as Bloomfield, all in the state of Kentucky, said lease to continue for thirty years upon the terms therein set out, in which it is stipulated by and on behalf of said first party herein that if the net earnings of said leased premises do not prove sufficient to pay the interest, and to provide for the sinking fund of 350 bonds of $1,000 each, bearing interest at the rate of 7 per cent per annum, payable half-yearly, on the 1st days of June and December, and having twenty years to run from the 2d day of July, A. D., 1879, to be issued by said Northern Division of the Cumberland & Ohio Railroad Company, and if all other sources of raising money of said Northern Division of the Cumberland & Ohio Railroad Company fail to provide for said interest and sinking fund, then said first party herein should supply the deficiency so far as the same may be done by appropriating the net earnings, or so much thereof as may be needed, on its own lines which may accrue to it by reason of business coming to it from or over the said lines of the said Northern Division of the Cumberland & Ohio Railroad Company; and whereas, said contract or lease has been fully consummated by action of the stockholders of the first party herein, and it is now desired to carry into effect the said stipulations as to said net earnings: Now in consideration of $1 cash in hand paid by said second party to said first party, and the premises, the said first party has this day, and does hereby, mortgage and put in lien all net earnings which may accrue to it by reason of business coming to it from or over said lines of the Northern Division of the Cumberland & Ohio Railroad Company, to the said Joshua F. Speed, as trustee, aforesaid (who is the trustee in the mortgage made by said Northern Division of the Cumberland & Ohio Railroad Company to secure said 350 bonds of $1,000 each), conditioned that, if the net earnings of said leased premises do not prove sufficient to pay the interest and provide for the sinking fund of said mortgage bonds, then said first party, if all other sources of raising money of said Northern Division of the Cumberland & Ohio Railroad Company prove insufficient, will supply the deficiency, so far as it may be done, by appropriating and paying over promptly the net earnings, or so much thereof as may be needed on its own lines, which may accrue by reason of business coming to it from or over said Northern Division of the Cumberland & Ohio Railroad Company's lines, for the purpose of discharging said interest and sinking fund as they severally fall due.

In testimony whereof, the said first party, acting under the authority and approval of its stockholders, duly assembled in stockholder's meeting on the 28th day of July, 1879, has caused these presents to be signed in duplicate in its corporate name by its president, and countersigned by the secretary, and its corporate seal hereto affixed, this 28th day of July, A. D. 1879.

It will further be seen that an order to better secure the holders of the bonds stipulated for in said lease, the Louisville, Cincinnati, & Lexington Railway Company executed a mortgage upon its net earnings derived from business coming to it from the lines of the said Cumberland & Ohio Railroad Company. It further appears that the trustee for the bondholders and the other contracting parties all united in the modified agreement, which, together with said mortgage, constitute one entire contract and agreement. Afterwards the appellee the Louisville & Nashville Railroad Company purchased the entire property, rights, and franchises of the Louisville, Cincinnati, & Lexington Railway Company, including the lease from the Cumberland & Ohio Railroad Company of its line of railroad from Shelbyville to Bloomfield; and it is claimed that the said Louisville & Nashville Railroad Company assumed and became bound to perform all the duties and incur all the obligations undertaken by the said Louisville, Cincinnati, & Lexington Railway Company. It appears that said Louisville and Nashville Railroad Company took possession of said railroad from Shelbyville to Bloomfield, and entered upon the execution of the contract aforesaid, and up to the filing of the petition herein had been operating said road from Shelbyville to Bloomfield, but had given notice of its intention to abandon the operation of said road; and thereupon the said Cumberland & Ohio Railroad Company and appellant Schmidt, trustee for the bondholders, instituted this action for the purpose aforesaid. It will be further seen from the contract aforesaid that the lessee was empowered to sell $250,000 of bonds of the Cumberland & Ohio Railroad Company for the purpose of raising funds for building the road; and various other stipulations as to the operation of said road, including the net earnings thereof, were to be applied to the payment of the interest and principal of said bonds, and, in the event that the earnings should not be sufficient, that the net earnings on its own lines which may accrue to it by reason of business coming to it from or over the said lines of the said Northern Division of the Cumberland & Ohio Railroad Company should also be applied to the payment of the bonds aforesaid. It was also provided that the lessee should furnish various sums of money, which, if not repaid by the earnings of the Cumberland & Ohio Railroad Company, should be a debt in favor of said lessee against the lessor; and it appears that the lessor, by reason of the failure of the road to meet the demands and expenses aforesaid, had become largely indebted to the lessee, for which a personal judgment has been obtained against the lessor in behalf of the appellee the Louisville & Nashville Railroad herein, and same returned, "No property found." It will be seen that, by the terms of the lease, the lessee was to operate said road from Shelbyville to Bloomfield for the term of thirty years. It is alleged in the petition that great and irreparable damage will be sustained by appellant if appellee should cease to operate the road in question, and it is made to appear that no adequate remedy, except a mandatory injunction, can be obtained by appellant. It is further claimed in the petition that the earnings of the Louisville, Cincinnati, & Lexington Railway derived from business coming to it over the Cumberland & Ohio Railroad have always been large, and there is now in the Louisville law and equity court a suit, appealed to this court, brought to enforce the claim of said trustee and said bondholders.

The answer of appellee admits that it purchased from the Louisville, Cincinnati, & Lexington Railway Company all its property rights which that company had the right to convey or assign, except the franchise to exist as a corporation, and that the Louisville, Cincinnati, & Lexington Railway Company undertook to assign and transfer to the appellee the lease from the Northern Division of the Cumberland & Ohio Railroad Company, referred to in the petition, but that said lease, by its express terms, provided that it shall not be assigned without the consent of the lessor, and the consent of the Northern Division of the Cumberland & Ohio Railroad Company was asked, and refused by said company, and said company has never given its consent to the assignment of said lease. But the answer admits that the appellee took possession of said leased property, and has operated same ever since, but claims that it has done so as tenant at sufferance, and not by virtue of the assignment of the lease. It denies that it has made any net earnings on the line of the Northern Division of the Cumberland & Ohio Railroad, or appropriated same to its own use, or that there ever have been any net earnings, but alleges that the necessary cost of operation has exceeded the receipts in the sum of $199,411.70. It is admitted that the appellant instituted suit against the Northern Division of the Cumberland & Ohio Railroad Company, and recovered judgment against it for $419,808.85, and that said company was justly indebted to appellee under the lease referred to, but which it failed and refused to pay. The answer also shows that the execution for said sum was returned "No property found," and judgment was rendered for the sale of the leased road subject to the prior mortgage of the bondholders, but that no one would bid anything for the road subject to the lien of the bondholders; hence no sale was made. It is also alleged that the court refused to give a judgment for sums which the appellee had lost in the necessary operation of said road, but confined its recovery to the amount that had been necessarily paid out by the Louisville, Cincinnati, & Lexington Railway Company in completing the construction of the road, and paying interest on the mortgage bonds. It is also denied that appellee completed the construction of the Northern Division of the Cumberland & Ohio Railroad, but is claimed that it was so completed by the Louisville, Cincinnati, & Lexington Railway Company before the assignment of the lease to the appellee. It also denies that appellant will suffer great or irreparable damages on account of appellee's ceasing to operate the road on December 31, 1895. It is admitted that the charter of the Cumberland & Ohio Railroad Company enjoins upon it the duty to operate its road, and appellee is entirely willing that said Northern Division of the Cumberland & Ohio Railroad Company shall discharge the duty imposed upon it by its charter, but denies that any such duty is imposed upon this appellee under said lease, and insists that no duty rests upon the lessee, except such as grows out of the lease itself, and is to the lessor. It is also claimed that, even if appellee was originally bound by the covenant of said lease, it would be harsh and inequitable to compel it to perform its onerous duties while said Cumberland & Ohio Railroad Company is continually in default in its covenant to repay to this appellee large sums of money. It also charges that the Cumberland & Ohio Railroad Company is insolvent. Appellee also denies that it owes any duty to the public or the bondholders represented by appellant to operate said road; claims that, if it owes any duty at all, it is only to the Northern Division of the Cumberland & Ohio Railroad Company; and, if it ever owed any duty to said company under said lease, it has been absolved therefrom by the default of the lessor, as aforesaid. It is claimed that appellee owes no duty to the bondholders, unless it is bound by the lease, and only so long as it is bound under and by the terms of said lease to operate said road; that whatever duty the Louisville, Cincinnati, & Lexington Railway Company undertook to perform to the bondholders was by reason of and growing out of the contract of lease with the Cumberland & Ohio Railroad Company; and it only bound itself during the term of said lease to account for the net earnings arising from the operation of said leased line, and to use the same as provided in the lease so far as it might be done towards the payment of the interest and the aggregation of a sinking fund for the retirement of said bonds, and it was only during the term of the lease, or that the lease should be in existence, and the said appellee operated said road under the lease, that it agreed to meet, so far as might be done from the profits on its own line on business coming to it from or over the Northern Division of the Cumberland & Ohio Railroad, the interest on the bonds aforesaid. It is claimed by the terms of the lease that the lessee was given the right to terminate the lease, and the duty of the lessee thereunder, and the rights of the lessor thereunder, by the sale of the franchise of the said Cumberland & Ohio Railroad Company, subject alone to the mortgage of $250,000 resting upon said property and franchise; and, appellee having a right to so terminate said lease and the duties of said lessee thereunder by sale, it also had the right of exhausting all means to compel performance by the Northern Division of the Cumberland & Ohio Railroad Company of its covenant to abandon said leased premises after eight years without sale: that appellee in good faith endeavored, through means of court, to sell the same; and, after failing to sell the same, appellee claims it has a right to abandon the lease, and all rights and duties thereunder, and submits to the court that, under all the circumstances, it would be inequitable, at the instance of the Northern Division of the Cumberland & Ohio Railroad Company or the bondholders, to compel it to continue the operation of said road at great loss to itself, when it is not within the power of the court to compel the Northern Division of the Cumberland & Ohio Railroad Company to perform its material covenants under the lease.

The defendant the Louisville, Cincinnati, & Lexington Railway Company, by its answer, shows that on the first day of November, 1881, it, by deed, sold and conveyed to its codefendant, the Louisville & Nashville Railroad Company, all its property, rights, and franchises, except the franchise to exist as a corporation; that since that day it has had no property, money, or credit, and, as a result, is unable to operate the Northern Division of the Cumberland & Ohio Railroad, or do anything else which requires money or credit. It also has no power to comply with the order of this court, even if it should be made, to operate said road.

The replies of appellant may be considered a traverse of the affirmative allegations of the answer, and the affirmative allegations of the replies are controverted of record. A temporary injunction was granted by the Shelby circuit court, and upon motion to modify or dissolve the injunction thereto before Judge Hazelrigg, of this court, the appellant was required to give an additional bond, and, having failed to do so, the injunction was dissolved. Upon final hearing, the circuit court dismissed the petition, and Adolph Schmidt, individually and as trustee for the bondholders of the Northern Division of the Cumberland & Ohio Railroad Company, has appealed.

It is contended by the appellee that the contract as claimed is too indefinite to be specifically enforced by a court of equity, and, even if the contract was more definite and certain, yet equity will not undertake to specifically enforce performance of a contract calling for continuous service requiring skill and judgment, and calling for continuous supervision upon the part of the court. It is also contended that the lessor in this case being in default, and having failed to comply with its obligation, the contract should not be enforced. It is also contended that this contract should not be specifically enforced because of harsh results that would follow its enforcement. It is further claimed that the appellee the Louisville & Nashville Railroad Company never became bound to operate the road in question for the term of thirty years. It is contended for appellant that appellee the Louisville & Nashville Railroad Company became bound to perform the covenant of the Louisville, Cincinnati, & Lexington Railway Company; secondly, the only way in which the rights of the bondholders under the contract can be protected is through the operation and maintenance of the Louisville, Cincinnati, & Lexington Railway and the Cumberland & Ohio Railroad; thirdly, this is a case of specific performance.

It seems to us that the appellee, having purchased all the property and rights of the Louisville, Cincinnati, & Lexington Railway Company, including the lease in question, and having taken charge of the road in question, and operated the same for a long time, and having elected to sue and recover the sums due to the Louisville, Cincinnati, & Lexington Railway Company from the Cumberland & Ohio Railroad Company, conclusively establishes the fact that it assumed whatever obligations the Louisville, Cincinnati, & Lexington Railway Company were under by virtue of the lease aforesaid; and it further seems clear that the appellee the Louisville & Nashville Railroad Company operated the road under and by virtue of said lease, and not as tenant by sufferance, and thus assumed all the obligations then resting upon the lessee. Wiggins Ferry Co. v.

Ohio & M. R. Co. 142 U. S. 408, 35 L. ed. 1059. The leases and mortgages hereinbefore referred to were for the benefit, not only of the lessor and lessee, but also for the benefit of the bondholders of the lessor company; and, this being true, it follows that the trustee for the bondholders has a right to maintain an action for the enforcement of the contract for the benefit of the bondholders. It is true that the lessor has not paid sums of money falling due under the lease to the appellee, but it by no means follows that such failure authorizes the lessee to abandon the contract, and cease to operate the road in question. It will be seen from the lease that certain acts or omissions to act should be held to terminate the lease, but the failure to pay the sums of money falling due from the lessor is not one of the conditions provided for as authorizing an abandonment of the lease. It is provided in the lease that, for the sums of money becoming due to the lessee from the lessor, the lessee might sue and recover the same, and is given a lien, subject to that of the bondholders, upon the road in question; and it may be well argued, this remedy being expressed in the lease, that a forfeiture of the lease was not intended to be allowed either as a remedy or punishment for nonpayment. Moreover, it was a statutory duty of lessor to operate the road, and, the lessee having for a term of thirty years agreed that the lessee should operate the same, it cannot be released therefrom on account of the failure of lessor to pay its indebtedness to the lessee, unless same had been one of the stipulations named in the lease. We are clearly of the opinion that the contract required the lessee to operate the road for the term specified. No other construction seems reasonable or tenable, and this view is sustained by the further fact that the lessee continued to operate the road for many years. But, be this as it may, the bondholders having an interest in the contract in question, and being in law a party thereto, the failure of the lessor to pay the sums due from it to the lessee cannot defeat the rights and interests acquired by the bondholders under and by virtue of the contract aforesaid.

It is earnestly insisted by appellee that the contract is not sufficiently certain to be specifically enforced. It seems, however, to us that the terms of the lease are sufficiently certain and definite to enable the court to compel specific performance. It would not be difficult for the court to safely and intelligently fix and determine the number of trains to be run upon the road, and arrange the various details necessary for the operation of the road; and a fair construction of the lease would authorize such an operation of the road as the business interests of the community from time to time would require. Robinson v. United States, 80 U. S. 18 Wall. 365, 20 L. ed. 654.

It is further insisted by appellee that a court of equity will not enforce specific performance of a contract calling for continuous service, involving skill and judgment, and requiring continuous supervision on the part of the court. Many authorities are cited in support of this contention, among which are the following: 8 Pom. Eq. Jur. § 1848, which reads as follows: "Contracts for Personal Services or Acts. Where a contract stipulates for special, unique, 88 L. R. A.

or extraordinary personal services or acts, or for such services or acts to be rendered or done by a party having special, unique, and extraordinary qualifications,—as, for example, by an eminent actor, singer, artist, and the like,—it is plain that the remedy at law of damages for its breach might be wholly inadequate, since no amount of money recovered by the plaintiff might enable him to obtain the same or the same kind of services or acts elsewhere, or by employing any other person. It is, however, a familiar doctrine that a court of equity will not exercise its jurisdiction to grant the remedy of an affirmative specific performance, however inadequate may be the remedy of damages, whenever the contract is of such a nature that the decree for its specific performance cannot be enforced and its obedience compelled by the ordinary processes of the court. A specific performance in such cases is said to be impossible, and contracts stipulating for personal acts have been regarded as the most familiar illustrations of this doctrine, since the court cannot in any direct manner compel an actor to act, a singer to sing, or an artist to paint. Applying the same course of reasoning, the English courts formerly held that they could not negatively enforce the specific performance of such contracts by means of an injunction restraining their violation. Those courts have, however, entirely receded from this latter conclusion. The rule is now firmly established in England that the violation of such contracts may be restrained by injunction, whenever the legal measure of damages would be inadequate, and the contract is of such a nature that its negative specific enforcement is possible. This rule was first applied to stipulations which were in form expressly negative, but was soon extended to affirmative contracts which implied or involved negative stipulations." It will be seen from the foregoing that the contract here sought to be enforced is essentially different from the illustrations or cases cited in the section quoted. Rutland Marble Co. v. Ripley, 77 U. S. 10 Wall. 358, 19 L. ed. 961, is cited. It will be seen from the opinion in that case that the contract was to deliver a quantity of marble of certain kinds, and in blocks of a kind; and the court there held that specific performance ought not to be granted, on account of the great difficulty of enforcing the same, and, further, that one party had the right at any time to terminate the contract on one year's notice. The case of Texas & P. R. Co. v. Marshall, 186 U. S. 406, 34 L. ed. 390, is relied on by appellee. It appears from that case that the city of Marshall agreed to give the Texas Railway Company $800,000 in bonds, and 66 acres of land for shops, etc.; and the company, in consideration of the donation, agreed to permanently establish its eastern terminus and offices at Marshall, and to establish and construct its machine shops, car works, etc., in said city. The city performed its agreement, and the company made Marshall its eastern terminus, and built a depot, etc., there. After the expiration of a few years, Marshall ceased to be the terminus of the road, and some of the shops were removed. The city filed its bill in equity to enforce the agreement, both as to the terminus and as to the shops. The court held that establishing the shops, etc., and keeping them there for eight years, and until the interest of the company and the public demanded the removal of some or all of them to some other place, satisfied the contract. It is true that the court also stated in substance that the various duties and acts to be performed were such as a court of equity would not undertake to specifically enforce, if the contract had required perpetual performance. It may be conceded that some of the authorities cited by appellee sustain its contention, but we deem it unnecessary to notice them any further in detail.

It is also insisted by appellee that the enforcement of the contract under consideration would result in great hardship, and equity will not enforce specific performance of a contract that will result in great hardship. We do not think the facts in this case bring it within the rule announced in any of the decisions cited. It is manifest that the loss to appellee by reason of expense incurred in building the road, and for which it has obtained judgment against the Cumberland & Ohio Railroad Company, will remain unaffected by operation of the leased line. A court of equity might refuse to enforce a contract that at the time of its execution involved hardship or was unconscionable; but the mere fact that one having a number of years to run might turn out a losing investment or contract affords no reason of refusal to specifically enforce it. Moreover, if we are to regard the judgment referred to in the pleadings in the case of Schmidt v. Louisville, O. & L. R. Co. 95 Ky. 289, and 301, the operation of the leased line has by no means been a total loss to the appellee.

It seems clear to us that there is no adequate relief for the bondholders to be had, except by specific enforcement of the contract; hence the important question to be considered is the power of the court to enforce specifically the contract, and whether the same, in equity, should be enforced. As before said, there is some authority cited which sustains the contention of appellee that courts of equity cannot or ought not to specifically enforce a contract requiring skill and long or continuous supervision of the court; but it is insisted by appellant that the weight of recent decisions sustains its contention that such contracts can and ought to be enforced, and he cites several decisions in support of this contention, among which is the case of Prospect Park & C. I. R. Co. v. Coney Island & B. R. Co. 144 N. Y. 152, 26 L. R. A. 610. It appears that the plaintiff granted to the defendant the use of certain of its tracks in the city, from a point named to said depot, for twenty-one years, from June 1, 1883, free of charge, and defendant covenanted to run cars to plaintiff's depot to connect with trains run to and from the island. The contract contained the provision that, in case defendant should use steam as a motive power on its line between the city and the island, either party could terminate the contract on six months' notice. The parties acted under the contract until October, 1889, when defendant adopted the trolley system of running cars by electricity for use upon its road between the city and the island, ceased to run its cars to said depot, and advised plaintiff that it did not intend to do so. The plaintiff instituted suit to compel specific performance of the contract. In the opinion the court said: "As a final point the learned counsel for the defendant insists that equity will not enforce the specific performance of a contract having some years to run which requires the exercise of skill and judgment and a continuous series of acts. While there is some conflict in the cases, and all are not to be reconciled, yet the great weight of authority permits specific performance in the case at bar. The special term enjoined the defendant from operating any of its cars unless it performs its contract with the plaintiff. The provisions of this contract are neither complicated nor difficult, and are such as a court of equity can enforce in its discretion. A few of the cases may be referred to as illustrating the power vested in a court of equity to compel the specific performance of contracts similar to the one at bar. In Storer v. Great Western R. Co. 2 Younge & C. Ch. Cas. 48, the court compelled the defendant to construct and forever maintain an archway and its approaches. The court said there was no difficulty in enforcing such a decree. In Wilson v. Furness R. Co. L. R. 9 Eq. 28, the defendant was compelled to erect and maintain a wharf. See also Green v. West Cheshire R. Co. L. R. 13 Eq. 44. In Wolverhampton & W. R. Co. v. London & N. W. R. Co. L. R. 16 Eq. 438, the agreement between the two companies was that the defendant should work the plaintiff's line, and during the continuance of the agreement develop and accommodate the local and through trade thereof and carry over it certain specific traffic. The bill was filed to restrain the defendant from carrying a portion of the traffic which ought to have passed over the plaintiff's line by other lines of the defendant. The point was made that the court could not undertake to enforce specific performance, because it would require a series of orders and a general superintendence to enforce the performance, which could not conveniently be administered by a court of justice. The injunction issued and Lord Selborne said (p. 438): 'With regard to the argument that upon the principles applicable to specific performance no relief can be granted, I cannot help observing that there is some fallacy and ambiguity in the way in which in cases of this character those words "specific performance" are used. . . . The common expression, as applied to suits known by that name, presupposes an executory as distinct from an executed agreement. . . . Confusion has sometimes arisen from transferring considerations applicable to suits for specific performance, properly so called, to questions as to the propriety of the court requiring something or other to be done in specie. . . . Ordinary agreements for work and labor to be performed, hiring and service and things of that sort, out of which most of the cases have arisen, are not, in the proper sense of the word, cases for "specific performance;" in other words, the nature of the contract is not one which requires the performance of some definite act, such as the court is in the habit of requiring to be performed by way of administering superior justice, rather than to leave the parties to their remedies at law. . . . The question is whether, the defendants being in possession, they are not at liberty to depart from the terms on which it was stipulated that they should have that possession.' The American cases are equally clear. In Lawrence v. Saratoga Lake R. Co. 36 Hun, 467, the defendant was, among other things, to erect a depot at which all trains were to stop. Specific performance was decreed, the court holding that, although under the agreement the defendant could not be compelled to run trains upon its road, yet it might properly be enjoined from running any regular trains which did not stop at the station. The objection that the judgment in this case involves continuous acts and the constant supervision of the court is well met by the reasoning in Central Trust Co. v. Wabash, St. L. & P. R. Co. 29 Fed. Rep. 546, being affirmed as Joy v. St. Louis, 188 U. S. 1, 47, 50, 34 L. ed. 848, 858, 859, where Judge Blatchford wrote the opinion. As to inconvenience or circumstances which affect the interest of one party alone constituting a reason why performance should not be decreed, the case of Rutland Marble Co. v. Ripley, 77 U. S. 10 Wall. 339, 358, 19 L. ed. 955, 961, furnishes a clear discussion of the general principles involved. The rule established by the above and kindred cases is that a contract is to be judged as of the time at which it was entered into; and if fair when made the fact that it has become a hard one by the force of subsequent circumstances or changing events will not necessarily prevent its specific performance. See also Stuart v. London & N. W. R. Co. 15 Beav. 518; Mortimer v. Capper, 1 Bro. Ch. 156; Jackson v. Lever, 3 Bro. Ch. 605; Paine v. Meller, 6 Ves. Jr. 349; Paine v. Hutchinson, L. R. 8 Eq. 257; Franklin Teleg. Co. v. Harrison, 145 U. S. 459, 472, 478, 36 L. ed. 776, 780, 781. A large number of other cases might be cited sustaining the power of the court to decree the specific performance of this contract, but we do not deem it necessary. There can be no well-founded doubt as to the power of the court in the premises, and the important question is whether, in the exercise of a wise discretion and in view of all the circumstances, specific performance should be decreed. After a most careful consideration of this case we have reached the conclusion that the plaintiff is entitled to have the contract specifically performed. The order of the general term is reversed and the judgment of the special term is affirmed, with costs in all the courts."

The case of Joy v. St. Louis, 188 U. S. 1, 34 L. ed. 848, seems also to sustain the contention of appellant. Union P. R. Co. v. Chicago, R. I. & P. R. Co., and Union P. R. Co. v. Chicago, M. & St. P. R. Co. (decided May 25, 1896) 163 U. S. 564, 41 L. ed. 265, were cases seeking specific enforcement of a contract for the use of certain railroad trackage rights. It was urged in those cases that courts of equity would not undertake to enforce specific performance of a contract requiring skill, and having a long time to run. The court, in discussing that question, said: "(3) The jurisdiction of courts of equity to decree the specific performance of agreements is of a very ancient date, and rests on the ground of the inadequacy and incompleteness of the remedy at law. Its exercise prevents the intolerable travesty of justice involved in permitting parties to refuse performance of their contracts at pleasure by electing to pay damages for the breach. It is not contended that multiplicity of suits to recover damages for the refusal of defendants to perform would afford adequate relief, nor could it be, for such a remedy under the circumstances would neither be plain nor complete, nor a sufficient substitute for the remedy in equity, nor would the interest of the public be subserved thereby. But it is objected that equity will not decree specific performance of a contract requiring continuous acts involving skill, judgment, and technical knowledge, nor enforce agreements to arbitrate, and that this case occupies that attitude. We do not think so. The decree is complete in itself, is self-operating and self-executing, and the provision for referees in certain contingencies is a mere matter of detail, and not of the essence of the contract. It must not be forgotten that in the increasing complexities of modern business relations, equitable remedies have necessarily and steadily been expanded, and no inflexible rule has been permitted to circumscribe them. As has been well said, equity has contrived its remedies, 'so that they shall correspond both to the primary right of the injured party, and to the wrong by which that right has been violated,' and 'has always preserved the elements of flexibility and the expansiveness, so that new ones may be invented, or old ones modified, in order to meet the requirements of every case, and to satisfy the needs of a progressive social condition in which new primary rights and duties are constantly arising and new kinds of wrongs are constantly committed.' Pom. Eq. Jur. § 111. We regard the case of Joy v. St. Louis, 188 U. S. 1, 34 L. ed. 848, as determining that this contract was one within the control of a court of equity to specifically enforce. In that case the St. Louis, Kansas City & Colorado Railroad Company acquired by succession under a contract the right of running its trains over the line of the Wabash Company from a point on the northern line of Forest Park, through the park and into the Union Depot at St. Louis, together with the right to use side tracks, switches, turnouts, and other terminal facilities. It was a continuing right and unlimited in time, and the contract contained provisions regulating the running of trains and prescribing the duties of superintendents, trainmasters, and other officers. The objections that are urged against the specific performance of the contract under consideration were urged against the specific performance of that contract and were severally overruled, and it was held that nothing short of the interposition of a court of equity would provide for the exigencies of the situation. This case was cited with approval in Franklin Teleg. Co. v. Harrison, 145 U. S. 459, 36 L. ed. 776. The contract there was one for the use by Harrison Brothers & Co. of a wire of the Franklin Telegraph Company between Philadelphia and New York. It appeared that Harrison Brothers & Co. had been in possession of a certain valuable contract with the Insulated Lines Telegraph Company, to the rights of which company the Franklin Telegraph Company had succeeded. Desiring to have that contract terminated, the Franklin Company entered into a new contract with

Harrison Brothers, by which the Franklin Company agreed to allow Harrison Brothers the right to put up, maintain, and use a telegraph wire on the poles of the Franklin Company. At the expiration of ten years thereafter the wires were to become the property of the telegraph company, after which time the telegraph company was to lease the same to Harrison Brothers for $600 per annum, payable quarterly, and with all the other terms and conditions as they existed before. The ten years having expired, Harrison Brothers continued to use the wire, paying the stipulated sum of $600 per annum therefor; but after this had gone on for about three years the telegraph company served notice on Harrison Brothers putting an end to the agreement, whereupon Harrison Brothers filed a bill to restrain the telegraph company from terminating the contract and to have the same specifically enforced, and this court held that the contract was one proper for specific performance. The same rule was laid down in Prospect Park & C. I. R. Co. v. Coney Island & B. R. Co. 144 N. Y. 252, 26 L. R. A. 610, where many authorities are cited. In Denter & R. G. R. Co. v. Alling, 99 U. S. 468, 25 L. ed. 428, this court directed an injunction against the Cañon City Railway Company from preventing the Denver road from using the right of way through the Grand Cañon, and said: 'If in any portion of the Grand Cañon, it is impracticable or impossible to lay down more than one roadbed and track, the court, while recognizing the prior right of the Denver Company to construct and operate that track for its own business, should, by proper orders, and upon such terms as may be just and equitable, establish and secure the right of the Cañon City Company, conferred by the act of March 8, 1875, to use the same roadbed and track, after completion, in common with the Denver Company. In Express Cases, 117 U. S. 1, 29 L. ed. 791, the express companies sought to restrain the railway companies from refusing to carry express matter on the terms of contracts which had expired, which the court held could not be done, and it was said: 'The legislature may impose a duty, and when imposed it will, if necessary, be enforced by the courts; but unless a duty has been created either by usage, or by contract, or by statute, courts cannot be called on to give it effect.' It was objected in Joy's Case that the court was proposing to assume the management of the railroad 'to the end of time;' but Mr. Justice Blatchford, speaking for the court, responded that the decree was complete in itself, and that it was 'not unusual for a court of equity to take supplemental proceedings to carry out its decree and make it effective under altered circumstances.' And the court applied the principle that considerations of the interests of the public must be given due weight by a court of equity, when a public means of transportation, such as a railroad, comes under its jurisdiction. 'Railroads are common carriers and owe duties to the public,' said Mr. Justice Blatchford. 'The rights of the public in respect to these great highways of communication should be fostered by the courts; and it is one of the most useful functions of a court of equity that its methods of procedure are capable of being made such as to accommodate themselves to the development of the interests of the public, in the progress of trade and traffic, by new methods of intercourse and transportation. The present case is a striking illustration. Here is a great public park, one of the lungs of an important city, which, in order to maintain its usefulness as a park, must be as free as possible from being serrated by railroads; and yet the interests of the public demand that it shall be crossed by a railroad. But the evil consequences of such crossing are to be reduced to a minimum by having a single right of way, and a single set of tracks, to be used by all the railroads which desire to cross the park. These two antagonisms must be reconciled, and that can be done only by the interposition of a court of equity, which thus will be exercising one of its most beneficent functions.' Clearly the public interests involved in the contracts before us demand that they should be upheld and enforced."

It seems to us that the weight of modern authorities sustains the contention of appellant, and a court of equity can enforce specific performance of the contract under consideration. It is pretty well known history of the country that many railroads, and for long terms, have been operated under the direct supervision and control of courts of equity. It does not seem to us that it would be difficult to enforce specific execution of the contract under consideration. The court might enforce its orders by attachment or rule according to equity practice, or, if deemed best, it might place the road in the hands of a receiver, to be operated at the cost and expense of the appellee the Louisville & Nashville Railroad Company.

For the reasons indicated, the judgment of the court below is reversed, and the case remanded, with directions to enter judgment requiring the appellee the Louisville & Nashville Railroad Company to operate the leased line until the expiration of the thirty years' lease aforesaid, and for proceedings consistent with this opinion.

A note payable in instalments is negotiable.

Carlton v. Kenealy, 12 Mees. & W. 189

Payment of an instalment cannot destroy that negotiability.

Ege v. Kyle, 2 Watts, 222; Dunning v. Heller, 103 Pa. 269; Second Nat. Bank v. Morgan, 165 Pa. 199.

A note may be on interest and retain its character of negotiability.

Woods v. North, 84 Pa. 407, 24 Am. Rep. 201.

A note payable in instalments, all to become due on default being made in the payment of the first instalment, does not make the amount uncertain nor the instrument non-negotiable.

Zimmerman v. Anderson, 67 Pa. 421, 5 Am. Rep. 447.

A note "payable twelve months after date" (or before, if made out of the sale of a machine) is negotiable.

Ernst v. Steckman, 74 Pa. 18, 15 Am. Rep. 542.

A note accompanied by the statement "that it is accompanied with certain collateral" is negotiable.

Valley Nat. Bank v. Crowell, 148 Pa. 284.

A note similar to the one in suit was declared negotiable.

Second Nat. Bank v. Morgan, 165 Pa. 199.

A note transferred as collateral for a debt then created does not lose its negotiability so as to let in evidence of failure of consideration, where the holder took without notice.

Munn v. M'Donald, 10 Watts, 270.

NOTE.—Payments indorsed on note as affecting negotiability.

FARMERS' BANK OF SPRINGVILLE V. SHIPPEY seems to be the first case in which the question of the effect of indorsements before its maturity of payments upon a note upon its negotiability has been directly considered. There seems to be no doubt that the fact that a note is payable by instalments does not destroy its negotiability. Oridge v. Sherborne, 11 Mees. & W. 374; Carlton v. Kenealy, 12 Mees. & W. 189, 1 Dowl. & L. 331, 12 L. J. Exch. N. S. 64, and cases cited in FARMERS' BANK OF SPRINGVILLE V. SHIPPEY.

But, on the other hand, it has been held that a note giving the right to pay at any time before maturity, deducting the interest until due, is not negotiable. Way v. Smith, 111 Mass. 523.

But neither of those decisions has any material bearing upon the question under consideration. In case of an instalment note the time for the payment of each instalment is fixed so that it is within the rule requiring certainty as to time of payment. On the other hand, the general right to pay at any time before maturity destroys the certainty as to the time of payment. So that such cases are within well-established rules.

In Knebelcamp v. Smith, 8 Ill. App. 244, a default was taken against the maker of a note so that the question of the execution of the note was foreclosed, but the court held that the maker might, on the assessment of damages, show that payments had been indorsed upon the note before its transfer for the purpose of reducing the face of the note by the amount of payments.

In Emerson v. Cutts, 12 Mass. 78, where a note had been returned to the payee after having been negotiated by him, and it was then renegotiated to the one who brought the suit, it appeared that payments had been indorsed on it, but the defense was not made in regard to them, but upon the ground 38 L. R. A.

that the note could not be renegotiated after having been returned to the payee.

In Johnson v. Kenyon, 2 Wils. 282, where the action was by an indorsee who had been paid a portion of the claim by his indorser, Gould, J., says where the drawer of a bill has paid part it may be indorsed over for the residue.

In Dryden v. Britton, 19 Wis. 23, where a note in favor of a third person which had been transferred to defendant was claimed as a set-off in a suit, it appeared that the payee was to ascertain and indorse upon the note the amount of payments which had been made, and the court held that until such payments were ascertained and indorsed the title did not pass so as to make the note available as a set-off, but there is no claim that the negotiability of the note was destroyed by such indorsement.

The implication from the above cases, so far as it goes, would seem to be in favor of the continued negotiability of the note after the indorsement of payments thereon.

The case which comes nearest to an actual decision is Ege v. Kyle, 2 Watts, 222, in that the head-note states that an indorsement on a negotiable note of a receipt on account of a quantity of iron, "the net proceeds of which are to be credited on the within," does not destroy its negotiable character; but the point is not brought out in the report of the case, although the fact of credit appears in the statement.

The cases in which payments would be indorsed upon the note prior to its maturity are doubtless few, but in a respectable number of cases notes have changed hands after payments have been indorsed on them. No question as to the negotiability of the note has been raised in such cases, however, so that, although the general opinion seems to have been that the negotiability was not affected by such indorsements, the question does not appear to have been previously raised and decided.

A bona fide holder of a negotiable note, for value, without notice, can recover, though he took it under circumstances which ought to excite the suspicion of a prudent man.

Phelan v. Moss, 67 Pa. 59, 5 Am. Rep. 402; Second Nat. Bank v. Morgan, 165 Pa. 199; Lancaster County Nat. Bank v. Garber, 178 Pa. 91.

Messrs. Charles E. Terry, Edwin J. Jordan, and James W. Platt, for appellants:

The essential element of a negotiable promissory note is that it should be certain. Certainty is required, first, as to the payee; second, as to the maker; thirdly, as to the amount to be paid; fourthly, as to the time when the payment is to be made; and fifthly, as to the fact itself of payment.

8 Wait, Act. & Def. 165; First Nat. Bank v. Bynum, 84 N. C. 24, 37 Am. Rep. 604; 1 Wait, Act. & Def. 538.

Certainty is a great object in mercantile instruments.

The indorsement of payments on the back of the note destroyed its negotiability.

Payments were made by persons who had not signed the note. Why did not this create uncertainty as to the terms, conditions, and persons who were to pay the note?

Overtorn v. Tyler, 3 Pa. 348, 45 Am. Dec. 645; Sweeney v. Thickett, 77 Pa. 181; 1 Parsons, Notes & Bills, 87; Woods v. North, 84 Pa. 407, 24 Am. Rep. 201; Johnston v. Speer, 92 Pa. 227, 87 Am. The amount of this note, moreover, could not be ascertained by calculation.

These defendants were sued and declared against jointly.

Where a note is joint and several the holder may bring separate actions. But he must proceed against all jointly on their joint contract or against the several makers separately.

8 Randolph, Com. Paper, ¶ 1667; Hart v. Withers, 1 Penn. & W. 285, 21 Am. Dec. 382; Rowan v. Rowan, 29 Pa. 181; Coughenour v. Suhre, 71 Pa. 462.

Dean, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The action was assumpsit upon a note of which the following is a copy:

$833.¹¹/₁₀₀. Tunkhannock, July 8th, 1891. One year after date, for value received, we or either of us promise to pay J. Thompson & Co., or order, eight hundred and thirty-three ¹¹/₁₀₀ dollars, at the Wyoming National Bank of Tunkhannock, Pa., with interest at 6 per cent per annum, interest payable annually.

This was signed by all of defendants, fifteen in number. On the back of the note were these indorsements: "July 11th, 1891. Rec'd 88 L. R. A.

of J. C. Reed thirty-three and ¹¹/₁₀₀ dollars, to apply on within note." There was a like indorsement of payment of a like amount as to seven others of the drawers, and indorsement of payment by one other in sum of $66.66, and one other in sum of $16.66. Then followed the indorsement of the payees, "J. Thompson & Co." On notice by defendants, before trial, the plaintiff proved it was bona fide holder, for value, before maturity, without notice of any defense by the drawers. The defendants offered evidence tending to prove that the note represented a part of the purchase price of a horse sold to twenty-five persons by Thompson & Co., through an agent, Shaw: that the whole price was $2,500. for which three notes of a like amount, $833.33 payable in one, two, and three years, were given, and that these notes were not to become obligatory on any one of the purchasers until the whole twenty-five had signed; that this note was not so signed; further, that gross misrepresentations had been made to them by Shaw as to the age and soundness of the horse. The court below, being of opinion that the indorsements destroyed the negotiability of the note, submitted the evidence to the jury on both particulars set up by the defendants. There was a verdict for defendants, and judgment having been entered thereon, plaintiff now appeals, assigning for error the refusal of the court to affirm its first point, as follows: "The note in suit is a negotiable instrument, and its negotiability is not destroyed by reason of the indorsements of payments thereon."

The reasons for denying the point fairly appear in the language of the court below, as follows: "Here was a note dated 8th July, 1891, due one year from date, and called for the payment of $833.33. Now, nothing can be paid on that note until the year is up, unless by the agreement of the parties and a modification of the contract which the parties then enter into. It seems from the face of the note, by the indorsements that were upon it at the time the plaintiff purchased it, that on the 11th July, 1891, the sum of $33 was paid by various parties, and indorsed upon the back of the note. That was before the note was due, and could only have been placed there by the consent of those who held the note at the time, through a modification of the contract as originally written. Now, the parties have agreed to modify this contract, and that they would agree to treat certain portions of this note as due before the year was up, and permit payments to be made. That reduced the amount of the note from $833.33 to a different amount, which is not stated on the face of the paper or anywhere else upon it. A note or instrument cannot be negotiable unless the amount due upon it is stated in writing or figures. The amount due upon the note in suit is nowhere stated in figures or writing upon it. When this note left the hands of these parties, it was negotiable paper, and remained such until it was modified by a different contract by the parties who held it. When they received any amount before the note was due, it modified the contract; so it is no longer a negotiable instrument, for the reason that the amount due is no longer stated on the face of the paper." The ruling of the court is based on the assumption that the note was executed on the 8th, and the contract modified by accepting payment on the 11th, three days after; that is, the payees of the note, to whom it was delivered on the 8th, subsequently, on the 11th, agreed to a change of contract with part only of the drawers, thereby rendering the amount due uncertain, a certain amount no longer appearing either in words or figures, on the face of the note. Taking the date as of the 8th, and the indorsements as of the 11th, the presumption that the indorsements were made after delivery would be warranted; but the court below seems to have overlooked the undisputed fact that the final execution of the note by delivery did not take place until the 13th. Three of the drawers signed after the indorsement of the payments. So, there was no modification of the contract, as between the drawers and the payee, after delivery. The indorsements were made as between the drawers themselves. Therefore, what would be the effect as to other drawers if part of them, after delivery to the payee, with his consent, modified the original contract, does not arise. When executed by delivery the contract was precisely what it now appears.

The note, on its face, being negotiable, and indorsed by the payee to plaintiff, who took it for value, without notice of any fraud, as between the original parties to it, did the indorsements on the back destroy its negotiability, so that plaintiff took it subject to any defense the drawers had as between them and the payees? "It is a necessary quality of negotiable paper that it should be simple, certain, unconditional, not subject to any contingency."

Woods v. North, 84 Pa. 407, 24 Am. Rep. 201. The note in question in that case had a clause "and 5 per cent collection fee if not paid when due." This court held that these words imported into the paper an undoubted element of uncertainty, because the amount of the collection fees could not be arbitrarily determined by the parties. A reasonable compensation was all that could be recovered, notwithstanding the stipulation. Unquestionably, if the 5 per cent was not unalterably fixed, if only a reasonable compensation, which might be 2, 3, or 4 per cent, could be added, then the face of the note signified no certain amount. It might just as well have been written "with reasonable charges for collection." But how does the indorsement of a payment before execution render the amount called for on the face of the note uncertain? It is a mere matter of computation, which, by reason of numerous payments, may be burdensome, but nevertheless the mathematical result is absolutely certain. In Ege v. Kyle, 2 Watts, 222, there was indorsed on the note, "Received on the within note, six tons nine hundred one-quarter and nineteen pounds of bar iron, the net proceeds arising from the sale of which are to be credited on the within, which is $397.50." The court below ruled that this indorsement did not affect the negotiability of the paper. And while, as argued by appellee, the principal contention in this court was whether the suit had been properly brought in the name of Kyle, nevertheless that was not the only one, for this point must have been passed on when this court decided: "The other errors are not supported." Although the case is meagerly reported, it is quite obvious that counsel had but little confidence in his point, and it was probably not pressed in either court. Ege v. Kyle was approved as a precedent on this point, in Dunning v. Heller, 103 Pa. 269, Paxson, J., delivering the opinion, saying: "It was held in Ege v. Kyle [2 Watts, 222], that an indorsement on a negotiable note of a receipt on account of a quantity of iron, 'the net proceeds of which are to be credited on the within,' . . . did not destroy its negotiable character." Such indorsement could not render the amount less certain than a promise to pay with interest; yet such a stipulation does not destroy the negotiability of the paper. "A negotiable note may be made payable with interest from its date, and, if more than lawful interest is stipulated for, it does not in Pennsylvania make the contract void, but only the usury." Woods v. North, 84 Pa. 407, 24 Am. Rep. 201. In the case of Second Nat. Bank v. Morgan, 165 Pa. 199, the suit was on a note of the precise amount of this one, and given for a like consideration. The question was as to the sufficiency of an affidavit of defense averring precisely the same misrepresentations and fraudulent conduct on part of payee, and that plaintiff had notice of the same, as were set up by the drawers in this case. It was held by this court that the note was negotiable, and the affidavit was insufficient. But, although a credit was indorsed by the payees on the back of the note of $116.66, neither the affidavit, the counsel for defendants, the court below, nor this court, intimate that that fact affected its negotiability. All assume it did not. The rarity of cases on a question which must be of such frequent occurrence as indorsements of payments on negotiable paper only indicated that since Ege v. Kyle, decided more than sixty years ago, the profession generally has assumed that such indorsements do not affect the negotiability of such paper. We are of the opinion that these indorsements did not take from the note its character as commercial paper, and that the learned judge of the court below erred in deciding otherwise. It is wholly immaterial who made the payments. When made, they were to that extent in relief of the drawers' liability, and, being made while the paper was still in their possession, the presumption, as between them and a bona fide holder, is absolute that they were made with their authority. The note being negotiable, the suit in favor of this plaintiff can be sustained jointly against all the drawers.

The judgment is reversed, and a v. j. d. n. awarded.

(188 Pa. 66.)

Adverse possession of the surface of land for sufficient time to give title, by one who has actual notice that a third person has purchased the underlying coal and is using the vein as part of his mine, which includes a larger tract, does not give title by adverse possession to the coal under the surface.

(October 25, 1897.)

APPEAL by plaintiffs from a decree of the Court of Common Pleas for Lackawanna County in favor of defendants in a suit brought to enjoin defendants from mining coal on plaintiffs' land. Reversed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. William H. Jessup and James H. Torrey, for appellants:

This is a case of first impression. We have been unable to find a decision upon the exact point in any of our reported cases.

Where a severance has taken place of the surface from the underlying strata of coal or other minerals, no possession of the surface constitutes any possession of the underlying strata.

Plummer v. Hillside Coal & I. Co. 160 Pa. 483; Kingsley v. Hillside Coal & I. Co. 144 Pa. 618; 1 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law, p. 262, note 1; Puinam Free School v. Fisher, 84 Me. 172; Caldwell v. Copeland, 87 Pa. 481, 76 Am. Dec. 486.

How, then, may one in possession of the surface merely obtain title by the statute of limitations to the minerals or strata of coal lying underneath?

Title to mines or quarries, whether open or unopened, as a separate subject-matter, is capable of acquisition under the limitation acts if the person claiming them has already the exclusive right to the surface, and if his acts show such a possession of them as, if he were not already entitled to the surface, would have enabled him to acquire a title to them as part of the entire solum from the surface down to the center; they will enable him to acquire a title to them as a separate subject-matter.

To constitute a continuous possession of mines, it is only necessary that the operations be prosecuted as continuously as the nature of the business and the custom of the country permit.

Actual possession is superior to constructive possession as the substance is superior to fiction. There is not in this case a conflict between two actual possessions, but between one actual and one constructive.

If any principle in the law of Pennsylvania can be regarded as settled by argument and authority, it is that which affirms that the legal title to uncultivated lands draws to it the possession, and that this possession is to be deemed actual for all purposes of remedy until it is interrupted by an actual entry, and adverse possession taken by another.

A mere physical possession of one seam of coal does not of itself create a presumption of the possession of all the other seams of coal lying thereunder.

MacSwinney, Mines, pp. 41, 42.

Williams, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

This case presents a question of considerable importance to the owners of mineral lands, which does not seem to have been decided by the courts, or to have been discussed by text-writers, so far as I have been able to discover. It will be readily understood from a brief statement of the facts out of which it arises. The plaintiff company is engaged in mining and selling anthracite coal. As early as 1825 it was the owner of a considerable body of contiguous lands which had been purchased by it because of the coal underlying it. A tract known as the "Porter Tract," containing 200 acres, was part of this body of coal land. The coal upon it was opened by the company at some time between 1830 and 1835, and mining operations begun under it. From that time to the present the company has been in the possession of its mineral deposit under the surface of the Porter tract by actual mining and by the use of the openings and gangways for purposes connected with the removal of coal from adjoining lands belonging to it. The defendant derives his title from one Alexander McDonald, who was an employee of the plaintiff, and who entered upon the surface of the Porter tract in 1836 or 1837, and began a residence upon and the cultivation of a small portion of it. It does not seem to admit of serious doubt that from 1850, and perhaps somewhat earlier, down for a period of more than twenty-one years, the possession of McDonald and his vendees of the land in controversy has been open, notorious, hostile, and exclusive. As to the surface, therefore, the defendant has acquired a title under the statute of limitations. The question raised by this record is whether he has also, under the circumstances just stated, acquired a title to the underlying coal. The general principles regulating the titles to upper and lower estates in the earth's crust are pretty well settled by our own cases. The ownership of the surface carries with it, if there be no obstacle to the application of the general rule, title downward to the center of the earth and upward indefinitely. So long as mineral deposits remain in place, they are part of the freehold, and pass with it by deed, gift, or other form of conveyance; but when the minerals are removed from their position or bed by mining they become personal property, and are sold like other personal chattels. If the owner grants to another the right or privilege of taking coal from his lands, this grant, if not an exclusive one, is not the grant of an interest in the land, but of an easement or incorporeal right, which leaves the title to the coal in place remaining in the grantor. But a grant of all the coal, or of the exclusive right to mine the coal, is a sale of the coal in place. The conveyance of the coal creates in the vendee an interest in land. The deed or other conveyance is within the recording acts, and is subject to all the rules and regulations governing conveyances of the surface. It may convey an estate in fee simple in the coal or other mineral, or any lesser estate, in the same manner, and by the same words of grant, made use of in conveyances of the surface. When such a conveyance has been made of the coal or other mineral it works a severance of the estate so conveyed from the surface; and, if the deed be recorded, it is constructive notice to all the world of the fact of severance. Thenceforward the owner of the soil may cultivate, inclose, and reside upon his estate for any length of time, but his possession will not extend below it. It will not grasp or affect in the slightest degree the estate below him which has been severed by the deed. In like manner the owner of the mineral estate may enter upon and operate it while the owner of the surface is leaving his estate unoccupied and wild, but the possession of the lower estate will not reach upward, and attach to the surface. Each estate may be occupied, conveyed, encumbered, sold by the sheriff, or allotted in partition, without any effect upon the other. If a trespasser enters either estate, and maintains possession, he can acquire title by the statute of limitations after twenty-one years to so much as he has actually held for that length of time; but his title will not extend above or below the estate on which he enters. If he would acquire any part of the mineral, he must make his entry upon, and maintain his position within the limits of the mineral estate for the requisite period of time in an open, notorious, exclusive, and continuous manner. Caldwell v. Copeland, 87 Pa. 427, 78 Am. Dec. 436; Armstrong v. Caldwell, 88 L. R. A.

58 Pa. 284; Kingsley v. Hillside Coal & I. Co. 144 Pa. 618. A covert or clandestine entry will not do. Such an entry will confer no right on the wrongdoer until his entry is, or by the exercise of due diligence might be, discovered by the owner. Until then the owner cannot know that his possession has been invaded. Until he has, or ought to have, such knowledge, he is not called upon to act, for he does not know that action in the premises is necessary, and the law does not require absurd or impossible things of anyone. Levey v. H. O. Fricke Coke Co. 166 Pa. 536, 23 L. R. A. 268; Scrantom Gas & Water Co. v. Lackawanna Iron & C. Co. 167 Pa. 136. Possession, to be adverse, must be open as well as continuous. The intruder must keep his flag flying in a visible and hostile manner. Plummer v. Hillside Coal & I. Co. 160 Pa. 488. So far on in our inquiry we have a well-beaten path to travel, but from this point forward we are without any definite landmark to guide us. The real question presented is, May there be a severance of the mineral estate from the surface by the acts of the owners of the original freehold? And, if so, May there be notice in fact of such severance to other persons that will affect them in the same manner as the constructive notice arising from the recording of the deed? It is very clear, as we have seen, that if the deed to the plaintiff had been for the coal under the Porter tract only, the entry of McDonald upon the surface, and his inclosure of a part of it, would have had no effect upon the lower estate. The rule is well settled by the cases cited above. The reason of the rule is that the sale of the coal severed it from the surface, and the recording of the deed gave constructive notice to McDonald of such severance, whether he had any knowledge of it or not. But the plaintiff's deed was for the whole of the land, including the soil and minerals. The company had the right, however, to develop and operate the mineral estate alone, if that was to its interest, and leave the surface untitled and uncleared. It elected to do so. It erected its breakers, opened its mine, extended its gangways, arranged its tracks and sidings, and began the production of coal for the market from beneath the surface of the Porter tract and its adjoining lands. In this manner it entered upon the actual possession of its mineral estate. For more than sixty years it has continued its possession without interruption in a manner that has been obvious to all persons in the neighborhood. No person could pass or enter upon the land without being confronted with the unmistakable proofs of the possession and active operations of the plaintiff in this, its subterranean estate. These proofs, including the structures, the culm piles, the prepared coal, the movements of men and cars about the pit's mouth, brought the knowledge of the plaintiff's operations to even the most casual observer in a much more effective and satisfactory manner than it could have been done by the mere existence of a recorded deed. Why should it not have the same legal effect? In this case there is still another element of notice, for the defendant not only made his entry upon the surface with full knowledge, from the acts of the owner, of his severance, and the occupancy of the lower estate by it, but he was in its employ, assisting in its mining operations. He was one of the persons by whose labor the plaintiff preserved its possession, and kept its own flag flying. Surely, notice, could go no further than this. The recording of a deed is notice, notwithstanding the party to be affected by it may never have known of its existence, or of the severance wrought by it, because he might have known, if he had exercised the vigilance the law requires of him, and examined the record. So, it is well settled, possession is notice, although the person to be affected did not know of it. It was his duty to take notice of the possession as well as of the record, and, if he failed to do it, it was his folly. He is held to know, because he might have known if he had made the examination which it was his duty to make. Here the possession of the owner was known. The estate in which it was at work was known, and the defendant was in its service, contributing by his own labor to the development of the mineral estate, and to the maintenance of his employer's possession. This was notice by, and because of, the clearest knowledge of all the facts. McDonald had this knowledge when he first entered upon the surface, and he was affected by it. He knew of the actual severance of the estates in the Porter tract. He knew the owners were in the exclusive possession of the lower one, and himself assisted as an employee in the work by which that possession was made visible and notorious. He never did anything to challenge their possession of the mineral estate. On the contrary, all he did, aside from the erection of a shelter on the surface, was as servant of the owner, under its direction, and in the clearest recognition of, and subserviency to, its title. Under such circumstances it is plain that, if he acquired a title to the surface of the 6 acres he claims, he could not clutch also the mineral estate, or any part of it, that lay below the surface. It would be inequitable and unjust to hold otherwise in this case. He had stolen in upon the surface while at work for the company that owned both it and the coal. He knew of the severance in fact of these estates, and aided in the general work that made the severance evident to the world. If, entering under such circumstances, he could acquire the surface, he is limited to it. Knowing all the facts, he was bound, if he desired to acquire title to his employer's mine, or any part of it, to enter upon the mineral estate at some point, take possession, hold it openly and adversely for twenty-one years, so that his position and claim could have been known to the owner. Any different holding would lead to very absurd results. It would require us to hold that constructive notice is better than actual notice. Even this is short of a full statement of the result of the contrary doctrine, for in reality it would require us to hold that notice in fact had no significance, and bound no one. If McDonald was not bound by the complete knowledge he possessed and the opportunity for inquiry which his relations to the owner afforded him, it would follow that actual knowledge did not so much as put him upon inquiry. It would be much more reasonable to strike down the constructive notice which the law raises from the recording of a deed than thus to put it out of the power of an owner to protect himself by the clearest disclosure of his possession of his estate, and its purpose, to one of his own employees. But it is said that the company was not engaged in mining immediately under the 6 acres of surface occupied by McDonald, and that there was considerable unmined coal in place directly below his inclosure. McDonald entered upon the surface of the Porter tract knowing of the severance of the coal under it from the surface. The plaintiff's mineral estate was protected as fully by this actual knowledge as it would have been by constructive notice, and no title by the statute of limitations could be acquired within the limits of that estate without an entry upon it. An entry upon another estate—that upon the surface—can have no effect outside the estate entered. If there is no severance, an entry upon the surface will extend downward, and draw to it a title to the underlying minerals; so that he who disseises another, and acquires title by the statute of limitations, will succeed to the estate of him upon whose possession he has entered. But, if a severance is made before his entry, and he has notice of that severance, either by the record, or by the state of the possession acquired both by observation and by years of service in the employment of the owner, his entry upon either of the estates will not affect the other. Possibly the question of the extent of the possession of a trespassing miner acquired by reason of his entry upon the mineral estate may sometime be presented. If so, it will be time to consider it when it comes before us. It is not in this case. As applicable to the facts now before us, we hold that the Porter tract, or so much of it as was accessible from the pit's mouth in use, so that coal could be mined and removed therefrom by the ordinary methods of mining, was in the actual possession of the plaintiff, and that no inclosure upon the surface of that tract by one who had notice of the severance would draw to it any part of the mineral estate within its limits. This disposes of the suggestion that the unmined coal under the 6 acres has been or could be acquired by McDonald by virtue of his possession on the surface. He acquired the surface because he put his actual possession against the constructive possession of the owner. He did not acquire the coal because he had actual notice of its severance from the surface by the owner. This limited his possession to the estate on which he entered.

These views require us to reverse the decree of the court below, to restore the preliminary injunction, and upon the facts that are undisputed to make the injunction perpetual; the costs of this appeal to be paid by the appellees.

INDIANA SUPREME COURT.

Benjamin F. WAMPLER, Appt.,

v.

STATE of Indiana, ex rel. Virgil H. ALEXANDER et al.

(.....Ind.....)

1. The facts stated in an alternative writ of mandamus may be supplemented by those stated in the application in determining whether or not they are sufficient to withstand a demurrer.
2. Mandamus may be invoked to force a township trustee to meet with others for the purpose of appointing a county superintendent as required by law, when they have met on a day fixed by law for that purpose, and have adjourned from day to day for want of a quorum.
3. The court knows judicially the proper biennial year in which the law requires trustees of each county in the state to meet and elect officers.
4. The statutory provisions naming the time for trustees to convene in order to appoint a county superintendent are directory only, and the failure to get a quorum on that day does not prevent a meeting for that purpose on a subsequent day.
5. An applicant for the writ of mandamus need not show any legal or special interest in the result, but only that he is a citizen and as such interested in common with other citizens in the execution of the law when the object of the action is to enforce the performance of a public duty or right in which the people in general are interested.

(October 26, 1897.)

A PPEAL by defendant from a judgment of the Circuit Court for Blackford County in favor of relators in a mandamus proceeding to compel him to meet with relators in his official capacity of township trustee for the purpose of transacting township business. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Mr. Jay A. Hindman, for appellant:

In the earlier practice it was held that the application, petition, or affidavit for the writ constitutes the complaint, and that the alternative writ is in the nature of a summons or notice.

Cory v. Carter, 48 Ind. 327, 17 Am. Rep. 738; Draper v. Cambridge, 20 Ind. 288; State, Fullheart, v. Buckles, 89 Ind. 272; Lewis v. Henley, 2 Ind. 332.

Later, a rule of practice was declared that the alternative writ constitutes the complaint, and must, within itself, state a prima facie cause of action.

Clarke County Comrs. v. State, Lewis, 61 Ind. 75; Boone County Comrs. v. State, Titus, 61 Ind. 379; Jessup v. Carey, 61 Ind. 584; Johnson v. Smith, 64 Ind. 275; Smith v. Johnson, 69 Ind. 55.

NOTE.—As to quorum, see also Lawrence v. Ingersoll (Tenn.) 6 L. R. A. 308, and note; Tillman v. Otter (Ky.) 29 L. R. A. 110; and State, Stanford, v. Ellington (N. C.) 30 L. R. A. 532.

This rule was modified in the case of Gill v. State, Ripley County Comrs., 72 Ind. 266, where it was held that the application and the writ constitute the complaint, and that the office of the alternative writ is to notify the defendant what it is sought to have him commanded to do, and to give him an opportunity to show cause against such mandate. This rule seems to be a departure from the established practice in almost every other jurisdiction, and is evidently not well supported by authority or fundamental principles of pleading.

In ordinary actions the rules of pleading are not so lax.

Farris v. Jones, 112 Ind. 498.

To adopt a rule of practice in extraordinary proceedings that would not be tolerated in ordinary actions seems to be without sanction of law, and in violation of fundamental principles of pleading.

Clarke County Comrs. v. State, Lewis, 61 Ind. 75; Caffyn v. State, Rader, 91 Ind. 324; State, Sigler, v. Madison County Comrs. 92 Ind. 133.

The application, strictly speaking, is not a part of the pleadings in the case.

High, Extr. Legal Rem. 3d ed. §§ 508-510, 514.

The alternative writ being regarded as the foundation of all the subsequent proceedings in the case, and resembling, in this respect, a declaration in an ordinary action at common law, it must show upon its face a clear right to the relief demanded, and the material facts upon which the relator relies must be distinctly set forth, so that they may be admitted or traversed by the return.

High, Extr. Legal Rem. §§ 536-538; Hambleton v. Dexter, 89 Mo. 188; 14 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law, p. 212; Florida C. & P. R. Co. v. State, Tavares, 31 Fla. 483, 20 L. R. A. 419.

In many jurisdictions a private citizen must have some special interest or right to be protected, independent of that which he holds in common with the public at large, to entitle him to mandamus.

Mitchell v. Boardman, 79 Me. 469; People, Russell, v. Inspectors & Agents of State Prison, 4 Mich. 187; Heffner v. Com., Kline, 28 Pa. 108; Reedy v. Eagle, 23 Kan. 254; State, Bamford, v. Hollinshead, 47 N. J. L. 439.

In other jurisdictions a more liberal rule obtains, and when the question is one of public right, and the object of the mandamus is to procure the enforcement of a public duty, the relator need not show that he has a special interest in the subject-matter of the action. But in these jurisdictions, where the rule is most liberal, it must at least be shown that the relator is a citizen and as such has an interest in the execution of the laws.

Decatur County Comrs. v. State, Hamilton, 86 Ind. 8.

The demurrer to the alternative writ called in question the right or authority of the relators to institute or maintain this suit.

Farris v. Jones, 112 Ind. 498.

The averments in the writ should show that the thing asked can be done, that its performance is not impossible, and that the relators have a clear right to the granting of the writ.

State, Officer, v. Grubb, 85 Ind. 218.

The writ of mandamus only issues where there is a clear and specific legal right to be enforced, or a duty which ought to be and can be performed, and where there is no other specific and adequate legal remedy.

High, Extr. Legal Rem. 8d ed. § 9.

Since the act in question could be performed only in conjunction with other persons, a time ought to have been fixed in the writ for the doing of the thing commanded, otherwise the mandate could not be obeyed by the respondent.

Especial care should be taken in framing the mandatory clause of the alternative mandamus, since the writ must be enforced in the terms in which it is issued, or not at all, and the relator is concluded by its terms.

High, Extr. Legal Rem. § 589; Florida C. & P. R. Co. v. State, Tavares, 31 Fla. 482, 20 L. R. A. 419.

The courts are powerless to award the peremptory writ of mandamus in any other form than that fixed by the alternative writ.

High, Extr. Legal Rem. § 548; 14 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law, p. 214.

Mandamus will not lie to compel the appointment of a county superintendent at a time other than that fixed by statute.

State, Fry, v. Martin County Comrs. 125 Ind. 247; Williamsport v. Kent, 14 Ind. 806; State, Walden, v. Vanosdal, 181 Ind. 888, 15 L. R. A. 832; State, Laughlin, v. Porter, 118 Ind. 79.

Mr. John A. Bonham for appellees.

Jordan, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

This was a proceeding in the lower court on the part of the relators, Virgil H. Alexander and Alexander Gable, to obtain a writ of mandate against the appellant, a township trustee of Blackford county, Indiana, to compel him to meet with them (who are also township trustees) for the purpose of electing a county superintendent of schools. On the filing of the application the court awarded an alternative writ. After being served with this writ the appellant appeared in court, and demurred, for insufficiency of facts, (1) to the application; (2) to the alternative writ; (3) to the application and alternative writ taken as one pleading. Each of these demurrers was overruled, and the proper exceptions were reserved. Appellant refusing to plead further, the court granted a peremptory writ of mandate, as prayed for by the relators, commanding the appellant to meet at the auditor's office at 9 o'clock A. M. on June 28, 1897, for the purpose of appointing a county superintendent. The several rulings of the court upon the demurrers are assigned as errors.

The following facts, among others, are substantially alleged in the application, and in part recited in the alternative writ: At and for more than one year prior to the filing of the application, on June 8, 1897, the relators were resident citizens and taxpayers of Blackford county, Indiana, and were each township trustees of said county. That there are four townships in that county, and no more; and appellant at the beginning of this action, and for more than one year prior to said time, was the duly elected, qualified, and acting trustee of Harrison township, of said county. That these relators and appellant, as such trustees, were, in pursuance of law, required to meet at the office of the county auditor on the 1st Monday of June, 1897, for the purpose of appointing a county superintendent. That in pursuance of the statute, and a previous written notice given by the county auditor to each and all of said trustees to meet at the time and place aforesaid stated, the relators, as such trustees, did on the 1st Monday in June, 1897, the same being June 7, 1897, at 9 o'clock A. M. meet at the office of the said auditor for the purpose of appointing a superintendent, but appellant, as such trustee, failed and refused to meet at said hour on said day, or at any other time during said day. That, by reason of the fact that there were four township trustees, it was necessary for three, at least, of that number to meet, in order to organize and proceed with the business of electing a superintendent. During all of said day none of the trustees except these relators met at said auditor's office, whereby they were prevented from perfecting an organization and appointing a county superintendent. That relators, from the time they met as aforesaid with the auditor at his office, remained there, ready to organize and appoint a superintendent, until the hour of 12 o'clock midnight on said day; and no other trustees having appeared at said meeting, or being present thereat, and that they being unable to transact any business, by reason of the absence of the other two trustees, they adjourned to meet at the same place on the day following (June 8, 1897) at 9 o'clock A. M. The relators again met at the time and place, in accordance with their adjournment, but neither the appellant nor the other trustee appeared at said meeting on said following day. It is further shown that these relators continued their meeting at the auditor's office on the day last mentioned, up to the time of filing their application herein; and it is alleged that they intend to meet for the purpose of electing a county superintendent, and adjourn from day to day, until a quorum is secured, etc. They aver that the business of appointing a superintendent cannot be effected without the appellant being present with them at said meeting, and that no other adequate remedy exists.

The first contention of counsel for appellant is that the facts as alone recited in the alternative writ are not sufficient to withstand a demurrer. Prior to the decision of Clarke County Comrs. v. State, Lewis, 61 Ind. 75, a practice of treating the application as the complaint, in actions for mandate, even where the alternative writ had been issued, seems to have been recognized by this court. In the case above cited a departure was made from this practice and it was there held, in view of the provisions of the Code of 1852 relative to mandamus suits, and upon the authority of Moses on Mandamus, that the alternative writ must be taken as in the nature of a complaint in the cause, and the facts stated therein must be sufficient to entitle the party to the writ. In Gill v. State, Ripley County Comrs., 73 Ind. 266, the former decisions of this court, including Clarke County Comrs. v. State, Levin, 61 Ind. 75, upon this question, were reviewed, and the rule was there stated as follows: "The alternative writ, when issued, will be taken as in the nature of a complaint in the cause, and 'must show what is claimed, and in itself, or in connection with the complaint, petition, or affidavit on which it issued, show the ground on which the claim is made; and the facts stated must be sufficient in law to entitle the party to the writ.'" The court further saying: "This, we think, in harmony with the spirit of the Code, and with the practice which has long obtained in this class of cases, and, while it does not overrule, will prevent any undue extension or misapplication of the rule enunciated in the later cases referred to." This holding was followed in Potts v. State, Ogg, 75 Ind. 386. Since the decision in Gill v. State, Ripley County Comrs., 72 Ind. 266, it has been the practice, in at least some of the trial courts in this state, to call in question by the same demurrer, the sufficiency of the facts stated in the writ and application, taken together; and this procedure seems to have been recognized by the appellant in the lower court, by addressing, as he did, in one particular, a demurrer to both the writ and application. In the case of La Grange County Comrs. v. Cutler, 7 Ind. 6, this court held that it had been the practice to look into the whole record and determine whether mandamus is the appropriate remedy, as well as the question whether the allegations are sufficient to authorize the writ. While it may be and ought to be considered the proper practice, under the more recent decisions of this court, which assert a rule of practice consistent with that generally prescribed by authorities on mandamus proceedings, to treat the alternative writ, unless the issuing thereof has been waived by the defendant, as a complaint, upon which issues of law and fact may be joined, and, generally speaking, the facts therein recited ought to be sufficient to justify the court in awarding the peremptory writ, nevertheless those alleged in the verified application, upon which the alternative writ rests, may be, when necessary, used or looked to in order to supplement those embraced in the writ, and the application may be considered by the court in connection with the alternative writ to which the demurrer may have been addressed. Therefore, if the facts in the writ alone, or when supplemented by those in the application, are sufficient to entitle the applicant to the peremptory writ, a demurrer addressed to the alternative writ alone, or to both the writ and application, should be overruled. This rule is in harmony with the holding in the cases of La Grange County Comrs. v. Cutler, 7 Ind. 6; Gill v. State, 72 Ind. 266, and Potts v. State, Ogg, 75 Ind. 386, and does not militate against other decisions of this court wherein, in effect, it is held that the writ, when considered alone, without reference to the application, must be sufficient. This point being settled, we are not, therefore, in this case, as insisted by appellant, compelled to confine our inquiry only to the facts in the writ, but may consider them together with those alleged in the application.

The principal question submitted for our decision is, Are the facts disclosed by the alternative writ and application, when considered together, sufficient to warrant the lower court in its action in overruling the demurrer to the writ and ordering the peremptory writ of mandate to issue, requiring the appellant to meet with the relators at the auditor's office of Blackford county on the day mentioned, for the purpose of appointing a county superintendent? The theory of the insistence of appellant's counsel is (1) that relators herein are not shown to have the requisite interest to entitle them to prosecute this action; (2) that, under the facts, mandamus will not lie to compel the appellant to meet for the purpose of electing a superintendent on a day subsequent to the 1st Monday in June, or, in other words, that he did not have the power, under the statute in controversy, of meeting after the time provided therein, for the reason, as contended, that the law is mandatory in this respect, and restrains him from doing so. Hence, on this ground, the principal contention is that he cannot be mandated by the court to exercise a power which he did not possess after the 1st Monday in June, 1897, and consequently there can be no meeting and election by the trustees until the next biennial year. It is also insisted that it does not appear from the facts that any vacancy had occurred in the office of superintendent in Blackford county, which was required to be filled on the 1st Monday in June, 1897. Rev. Stat. 1894, § 5900; Rev. Stat. 1881, § 4424, provides: "The township trustees . . . of each county shall meet at the office of the county auditor of such county, on the 1st Monday in June, 1878, and biennially thereafter, and appoint a county superintendent . . . whose official term shall expire as soon as his successor is appointed and qualified. . . . Whenever a vacancy shall occur in the office of county superintendent, by death, resignation, or removal, the said trustees, on notice of the county auditor, shall assemble at the office of such auditor, and fill such vacancy for the unexpired portion of the term . . . and the county auditor shall be clerk of such election in all cases, and give the casting vote in case of a tie," etc. Rev. Stat. 1894, § 1182; Rev. Stat. 1881, § 1168, being § 804 of the Code of Civil Procedure, provides: "Writs of mandate may be issued to any inferior tribunal, corporation, board, or person to compel the performance of an act which the law especially enjoins, or a duty resulting from an office, trust, or station." Under this provision of our Code, the rule is well affirmed that mandamus is the proper remedy to coerce an officer to discharge a public duty, and any person having an interest in the matter involved may apply for the writ. Hamilton v. State, Bates, 8 Ind. 452; Henderson v. State, Oerman, 58 Ind. 60; Holiday v. Henderson, 67 Ind. 108. Mandamus is regarded as an extraordinary remedy of an equitable nature, which will lie only where the law affords no other adequate remedy, and hence, without the aid of the writ, there would be a failure of justice. The statute, in express terms, lodges the election of a county superintendent in the township trustees of each county, and imposes upon each of them the duty of meeting on the 1st Monday in June, beginning in 1878, and on the same day biennially thereafter, at the place designated, and of appointing a county superintendent. This being a duty enjoined upon these officials by law, therefore, in the event they refuse or neglect to discharge it, it then becomes one of the peculiar functions of a mandate to compel them to obey the law by discharging this duty, as there are no other adequate means to meet and remedy the evils and injustice which would result by reason of the failure or refusal of these public servants to respect and obey the law. Certainly, it cannot be successfully controverted but what mandamus may be invoked to force township trustees, or any one thereof, to meet with each other at the same time and place prescribed by law, and proceed with the business of appointing a county superintendent. This being true, then, if it can be said that they are not restrained or prohibited by the statute in question from meeting and performing this duty after the day prescribed, but still have the power to subsequently do so, there is no question but what, in the event of their failure or refusal to meet for the purpose mentioned after the lapse of the time fixed by law, they may also be compelled to do so by a writ of mandate, on the application of any person shown to be invested with the right in the particular instance to demand it. People, Smith, v. Schiellein, 95 N. Y. 124.

Having reached this conclusion, we may proceed to determine whether, in view of the facts in this cause and the law applicable thereto, the appellant still had the legal power to meet for the purpose provided by the statute after the expiration of the time therein fixed, and was it his duty to exercise this power? We may, however, first say, in answer to appellant's insistence, namely, that there are no facts alleged showing that any vacancy had occurred in the office of superintendent of Blackford county which required a meeting of the trustees on the 1st Monday in June, 1897, in order to fill the same, that we recognize no merit in this contention. Under the provisions of the statute the official term of a county superintendent extends from one biennial election to the next, and terminates as soon as his successor is elected and qualified; and anyone appointed to fill a vacancy holds only for the unexpired part of the term, and until his successor is elected and qualified at the next ensuing biennial election. We accordingly judicially know that 1897 is the proper biennial year in which the trustees of each county in the state were required to meet on the 1st Monday in June and elect successors to the superintendents then in office. In arriving at a correct interpretation of the only point now involved, we may consider it, first, in the light of our own decisions which have a bearing thereon, and next in that of other authorities. In the case of State, Dickerson, v. Harrison, 67 Ind. 71, it appeared that the trustees, being twelve in number, met on the 1st Monday in June, 1879, but were unable to choose a superintendent. On the morning of the next day they adjourned sine die. In pursuance of a notice from the auditor, eleven of them convened again at his office on June 16, 1879, and organized, and were proceeding to appoint a superintendent, when three of the number withdrew from the meeting, and the remaining eight selected a superintendent. The election was held invalid. The question, as there involved, seems to have received but a cursory consideration, and the only reason given to support the decision is the bare mention of the fact that the appointment not having been made on the 1st Monday in June, and no vacancy existing, by reason of removal, resignation, or death, the appointment of the appellant therein was not authorized. In Sackett v. State, Foreman, 74 Ind. 486, the statute there involved required the common council of each city to annually elect at its first regular meeting in June one school trustee. The common council of the city of New Albany having failed to elect such trustee at its first regular meeting in June, in 1880, it performed this duty at a regular session held on July 19 of that year, and this action of the council was sustained. This court held in that case that, while the election should have occurred at the first regular meeting in June, still the statute could not be construed as limiting the power of the council to the time prescribed, but that it could be legally exercised by electing a trustee on a subsequent day. In course of the opinion, on page 489, it was said by the court, per Woods, J.: "The counsel for the appellee, on the contrary, insist that, under the law, the duty to elect is imperative, and that, in so far as it prescribes the time when the election shall be had, the statute is directory only. We concur in this position. The opposite view leads directly and necessarily to results which it is impossible to believe could have been intended by the legislature, and which an examination of the provisions of the law will plainly show were not intended. A failure to elect at the appointed time, as may well have been conceived, is liable to happen from many causes. A quorum of the common council may be wanting on account of accident, or of sickness or of absence of its members, and, when a quorum is not wanting a tie vote may defeat a choice. But if it be held that a failure to elect suspends the power to elect until the recurrence of the prescribed day, it is easy to see that corrupt motives and influences may intervene for the purpose of preventing an election at the appointed time. If reasonably possible to be escaped, an interpretation of the law which promotes or tends to such results should not be adopted." The case of State, Dickerson, v. Harrison, 67 Ind. 71, was distinguished in this last appeal, and in referring to it Judge Woods said: "It may well be doubted, however, whether, if an election had been accomplished upon the second day, or upon the day of an adjourned meeting, held within a reasonable time, it would have been declared invalid; and possibly, after the adjournment without day, a mandamus might lawfully have issued to compel a reassemblage, in order to perform the work which they ought to have done before adjourning." In State, Walden, v. Vanosdal, 181 Ind. 388, 15 L. R. A. 832, the trustees met on the 1st Monday in June of the required year, and remained in continuous session until after midnight on that day, after which hour they elected a superintendent. This election was held valid. In People v. Allen, 6 Wend. 486, the militia law of the state of New York made it the duty of certain commanding officers to appoint brigade court martials on or before the 1st day of June in each year. The commanding officer omitted to appoint the court-martial in that case until July next following the time fixed by the law. The appointment was held valid. In reviewing the question of the power of the officer to appoint the court-martial the court said: "Where a statute specifies the time within which a public officer is to perform an official act regarding the rights and duties of others, it will be considered directory merely, unless the nature of the act to be performed, or the language used by the legislature, shows that the designation of the time was intended as a limitation of the power of the officer." This statement of the law, at least in five appeals, has been expressly approved by this court. See Nave v. King, 27 Ind. 356; Day v. Herod, 38 Ind. 197; Jones v. Carnahan, 63 Ind. 229; Sackett v. State, Foreman, 74 Ind. 486; Jones v. Swift, 94 Ind. 516. In Dill. Mun. Corp. 3d ed. § 859, the author says: "In this country it has been decided that an election for municipal officers may be held after the charter day, and that a mandamus may be granted to compel the proper officers to give notice thereof." In State, Parker, v. Smith, 22 Minn. 218, the common council of the city of Duluth was invested by law with the appointment of a city assessor. The time fixed for his election by the city charter was at the first meeting of the council after the annual city election, or at an adjournment thereof. In 1874 the annual election was held on the 1st Tuesday in April. After this election the common council met, on the 14th of that month, and adjourned sine die, without having elected an assessor. On the 29th of April in the same year the council convened pursuant to an irregular adjournment, by a less number than a quorum, from a previous regular meeting, and elected an assessor. It was held that the latter was legally elected and entitled to the office. The court, in considering the point raised in the case, said: "In our judgment, the meeting held on April 14, 1874, with the presumed assent and participation of all of its members, was a valid meeting. Assuming that this was the proper time for the election of an assessor, the failure of the council then to act upon the matter, and its adjournment sine die, did not relieve it from the duty, which the law imposed upon it, of making an election. So far as relates to the time when such election should be made, the statute is simply directory. Having neglected its duty at the proper time, from whatever cause, the obligation still rested upon it to elect at the earliest opportunity."

While it is true that the statute in controversy does not in express terms provide for a meeting of the trustees on a day subsequent to the one named, neither does it expressly limit the power or right to meet on the day prescribed, and not thereafter. The duty of the trustees, under the statute, to elect a superintendent biennially, is imperative, and each of them is obligated to convene with the others on the 1st Monday in June of the proper year for that purpose. But there are no negative words in the statute, nor any features or provisions therein to indicate that the legislature, under all circumstances, intended to limit their power to meet for the discharge of the duty assigned to the day appointed, and thereby restrain or prohibit them from effectually executing it after the expiration of the time named. Upon this view of the case, under the rule so firmly settled by the authorities heretofore referred to, and others hereafter cited, the provisions of this statute naming or fixing the time for the trustees to convene must be considered as directory only, and not as prohibiting the exercise of the power or discharge of the duty imposed after the termination of the time named or appointed therein. Guided by this principle, and it is manifest, we think, that the legislature in naming the 1st Monday in June, intended it as a direction to the township trustees to meet on that day and proceed to transact the required business of appointing a county superintendent. There is nothing in the character of the particular power with which the trustees are invested to warrant the inference or belief that, on their failure to meet at the time mentioned, they could not lawfully and effectually execute it on some subsequent day, as reasonably near as possible to that fixed by the statute. The following additional authorities support this construction of the statute in controversy: Smith, Const. & Stat. Constr. §§ 670, 674; Sedgw. Stat. & Const. L. p. 316; Potter's Dwar. Stat. pp. 221, 228; People, Young, v. Fairbury Trustees, 51 Ill. 149; State, Anderson, v. Harris, 17 Ohio St. 608; Webster v. French, 12 Ill. 302; Pond v. Negus, 3 Mass. 230, 3 Am. Dec. 181; Williams v. School Dist. No. 1, 21 Pick. 75, 32 Am. Dec. 243; Savage v. Walske, 26 Ala. 619; Lowell v. Hadley, 8 Met. 180; Ex parte Heath, 3 Hill. 42; Gale v. Mead, 2 Denio, 160; People, Westcott, v. Holley, 12 Wend. 481; Jackson, Hooker, v. Young, 5 Cow. 269, 15 Am. Dec. 478; Colt v. Eves, 12 Conn. 248.

To place the interpretation upon the statute urged by the appellant would enable designing trustees to defeat its very object. By the failure or refusal of a sufficient number to meet on the day named, they might prevent a quorum from being obtained, and consequently no legal election could be effected on that day. If, then, as contended by appellant, there can be no valid meeting had or appointment made, by either compulsory proceedings or otherwise, until the same day at the next biennial period, the people would be at the mercy of such unfaithful officials, and the possible result might be to keep an incumbent in office perpetually. Under such an interpretation of this statute, a like result might follow if a sufficient number of trustees should be prevented from assembling on the prescribed day, so as to defeat a quorum, by reason of sickness, or any other legitimate cause. Such results were not intended by the legislature in the passage of the law in question. There were four trustees in Blackford county, any three of whom, had they been present, would have secured a quorum for the lawful transaction of the business before them. State, Walden, v. Vanosdal, 131 Ind. 383, 15 L. R. A. 832, and the cases there cited. Relators, being less than a quorum, could do nothing more than adjourn, as they did. Roberts, Rules of Order, § 43; Cushing, Manual of Parliamentary Law, § 19;

1 Beach, Priv. Corp. § 276; 1 Thomp. Corp. § 721. Appellant's presence, under the circumstances, was essentially necessary, and, having the legal ability to be present, he refused to yield his obedience to the law and meet with relators, and thereby assist to carry out its object and purpose; and now, when confronted with the strong arm of the court, compelling the performance of a wilfully omitted duty, he seeks to shield himself from its performance under the claim and upon the ground asserted that he no longer possesses the power to do so. This claim, as we have seen, the law does not support. The authorities constrain us to hold that under the facts the obligation to perform this important public duty continued to rest on appellant after the expiration of the legally appointed day, and the law did not deprive him of the power to perform it thereafter, and mandamus is the proper action to remedy the wrong perpetrated by him. In addition to other authorities on this point, see Smith, Addison, Torts, p. 648. Where the question involved in a mandamus proceeding is of a public concern, as is the one herein, and the object of the action is to enforce the performance of a public duty or right in which the people in general are interested, the applicant for the writ is not required to show any legal or special interest in the result sought to be obtained. It is only necessary that he be a citizen, and as such interested in common with other citizens in the execution of the law. High, Extr. Legal Rem. § 431; Decatur County Comrs. v. State, 86 Ind. 8, and cases there cited. It follows, therefore, that the relators are shown to have the requisite degree of interest to enable them to maintain this action. It is to be regretted that appellant, as a public official, intrusted, under the law, with a public duty, should disregard its plain provisions and commands. Such neglect or refusal to perform a duty which he had sworn to discharge merits severe condemnation. When public officers charged with the execution of the law refuse to obey its mandates, or wilfully ignore them, the evil results which must necessarily follow from such acts tend to undermine the very foundation of civil government. When such officers fail or refuse to discharge their plain duties under the law, not only do they violate their official oaths, but also subject themselves to the penalty imposed by Rev. Stat. 1894, § 2105 (Rev. Stat. 1881, § 2018). It follows from the conclusion reached that the lower court was fully justified in overruling the demurrers, and in awarding the peremptory writ of mandate, as it did. So far as the holding in State v. Harrison, supra, may be in conflict with this opinion, it must be deemed and held to be overruled.

Judgment affirmed.

VIRGINIA SUPREME COURT OF APPEALS.

Sarah A. TERRY, Plff. in Err.,

v.

City of RICHMOND.

(.....Va.....)

1. Permission to lay tracks under a street is within the power given to a city council to determine and designate the route and grade of any railroad to be laid in the city.
2. The caving of an excavation under a street through the negligence of the railroad company making it does not make a city liable for injuries to adjacent buildings, if the company had authority from the state to lay its tracks within the city, and the city had legally granted its permission.
3. Taking a bond from a railroad company which is about to lay tracks in its streets to save the city from the results of possible negligence of the company will not increase the liability of the city in case of such negligence.

The city, in authorizing the railroad company to run under the street, instead of along the same at some grade to be determined, acted within her power.

Chicago v. Rumsey, 87 Ill. 848.

Riely, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The Richmond & Chesapeake Railroad Company, a corporation created by the general assembly of Virginia, was authorized by its charter to construct and operate a railroad from the city of Richmond to a point on the Chesapeake bay, near the mouth of the Potomac river.

The council of the city, under the authority vested in it by the charter of the city, adopted an ordinance authorizing the railroad company to enter the city and use its streets for its roadway, and to build and construct a tunnel for a double railway track under Eighth street.

The company began the construction of the tunnel, and, after partly excavating it, ceased to work upon it. The tunnel, not being properly supported or arched, subsequently gave way in the center of the street, and the superincumbent earth caved in. This caused the earth to recede from the front of plaintiff's lot, and greatly injured two tenement houses thereon belonging to her. The city, after the caving in of the tunnel, caused the excavation to be filled, and the street to be repaired.

This suit was brought by the owner of the property to recover from the city the damages she had sustained. The question to be decided is whether or not the city is liable for the negligence or wrongful acts of the railroad company.

The railroad company being created and chartered by the sovereign power of the state, and authorized to construct and operate a railroad from the city of Richmond, and the council of the city being authorized by its charter to permit the railroad company to enter and use its streets for its roadway, the legality of the action of the council in granting such permission is beyond question, and no liability therefor can be maintained.

The right of the council to determine and designate the route and grade of any railroad to be laid in the city includes the authority to permit the railroad company to run under the street as well as upon it. The servitude is the same in each case. As was said in the case of Chicago v. Rumsey, 87 Ill. 864: "There is no principle upon which the right to locate a railroad upon a street, as a legitimate use of the street, can be sanctioned which will not also sanction the construction of a tunnel in a street. The tunnel does not change the character of the street or apply it to a new use."

The ordinance adopted by the council in granting to the railroad company the right to occupy the streets of the city, and construct the tunnel, shows that great care was taken by the requirement of proper safeguards to prevent the obstruction of or interference with the reasonable and legitimate use of the streets by the public.

The building of the railroad and the construction of the tunnel were solely the undertaking of the railroad company. It alone paid or was liable for all the expense of the work. Beyond prescribing the route and grade of the road and making due provision for the safety of its streets and the preservation of its culverts, sewers, and water and gas pipes, and seeing that its requirements in respect to these matters were observed, the city exercised no control of the enterprise, nor took nor had any part in it. The improvement was not undertaken for its profit, but was a private enterprise for private profit. The railroad company was in no sense the agent of the city, but in constructing and operating the road it was acting and would act for itself, and not for the city.

The permission granted to enter and use the streets of the city for a roadway conferred no right whatever upon the railroad company to take or invade the property of any citizen without just compensation, or sanctioned any tort it might commit, any more than a license to a person to engage in some legitimate private business requiring such license would render it liable for a tort that such person might commit in the pursuit of the business he was so licensed to carry on.

In Elliott, Roads & Streets, p. 532, the law on this subject is thus stated: "In granting a right to occupy a street by a railroad track, a municipal corporation exercises a delegated governmental power, and for the bare exercise of such a power is not liable to abutting owners.

It is evident that the exercise of a governmental power cannot, of itself, subject the municipality to a private action, but if the municipal corporation should join the railroad company in doing an act which would so impair the easement of access or so injure the abutting property as to cause the property owner special damages, then, it may be that the owner could maintain his action for damages. Where, however, no more is done than the enactment of an ordinance granting the privilege of occupancy, it seems quite clear that no private action would lie against the municipality for damages."

In Dillenbach v. Xenia, 41 Ohio St. 207, it was held that where a city, under the authority given it by statute, granted to a railroad company the right to construct and use its track in a street, the city was not liable to the owner of a lot adjacent to the street for damages to his property resulting from such use of the street by the railroad company.

In Burkam v. Ohio & M. R. Co. 122 Ind. 344, Elliott, J., speaking for the court, said "We have no doubt that an abutting owner has a proprietary right in the street of which he cannot be deprived without compensation. . . . But it by no means follows from this that a city in granting a right to a railroad company to use a street deprives the abutter of his property. The grant by the municipal corporation transfers no proprietary rights of the abutter, it simply grants the privilege the city has power to grant. In granting such a privilege a city exercises a power delegated to it by the sovereign, and it is not liable for exercising such a power. . . . Notwithstanding the grant by the municipality, the abutting owner has a right to recover such damage as he may have sustained by the additional burden imposed upon his land. . . . But the right of the abutter to compensation is against the railroad company and not against the city." See also Prith v. Dubuque, 45 Iowa, 406.

The bond of indemnity taken by the city of Richmond from the Richmond & Chesapeake Railroad Company did not operate to impose upon the city a liability which would not have otherwise existed, nor have the effect of making it responsible for any damage done by the railroad company, where the law would not have made it liable in the absence of such bond. The provisions of the bond show that the object of the city in requiring it was to protect itself against any loss it might be subjected to, or any expense it might have to incur, in consequence of the failure of the railroad company to comply with the requirements of the ordinance granting to it permission to construct the tunnel, and also to provide indemnity to any who might sustain injury to his person or property by the negligence or wrongful acts of the railroad company in the construction or use of the tunnel, if he chose to avail himself of it. Taking the bond did not increase the liability of the city.

A number of cases decided by this court, in which the municipality was held responsible, were cited and relied on to support the claim of liability of the city in the case at bar, but they do not support the contention of the plaintiff in error. The liability in those cases rested upon a different ground from that which underlies this case. Its solution depends upon the application of a different principle. The act of the city, which is the subject of the complaint here, was the exercise of a delegated governmental power, but it will be found upon examination that the liability in each and all of the cases referred to was based either upon a tort committed by the city itself through its officers or agents, or upon the neglect of the city to perform some ministerial and absolute corporate duty, such as not giving warning of the dangerous condition of the entrance to its sidewalk from an established walking way (Orme v. Richmond, 79 Va. 56); or not keeping its sidewalk in a safe condition (Noble v. Richmond, 31 Gratt. 280, 81 Am. Rep. 726); or for falling, when elevating the grade of its street, to make provision for the escape of surface water, and causing it to flow back upon an adjoining lot (Smith v. Alexandria, 33 Gratt. 208); or for neglecting to repair a sewer (Chalkley v. Richmond, 88 Va. 402); or for infringing, in lowering the grade of a street, upon the right of the owner of an adjoining lot to lateral support for his soil (Stearns v. Richmond, 88 Va. 992); or for allowing obstructions to be in the water adjacent to a wharf owned by the city, and for whose use it charged, or was entitled to charge, wharfage (Petersburg v. Applegarth, 28 Gratt. 321, 26 Am. Rep. 357). In no one of them was the question involved which is here presented. In no one of them was the claim against the city for damages for a tort committed by an individual or a body corporate in the pursuit of his or its business, and for his or its own benefit and profit.

The duty of a municipal corporation to see that its streets and sidewalks are in a safe com-dition, and that its sewers and drains are kept in good order, and that its other like municipal obligations are cared for, is a purely ministerial and absolute corporate duty, assumed in consideration of the privileges conferred by its charter; and the law holds the municipality responsible for an injury resulting from the negligent discharge of such duty, or the negligent omission to discharge it, but exempts it from liability for the exercise of governmental or discretionary powers. Richmond v. Long, 17 Gratt. 875, 94 Am. Dec. 461; Petersburg v. Applegarth, 28 Gratt. 843, 26 Am. Rep. 357; Mills v. Brooklyn, 83 N. Y. 489, 497; Hill v. Boston, 123 Mass. 344, 23 Am. Rep. 332; Elliot, Roads & Streets, pp. 504, 532; 2 Dill. Mun. Corp. §§ 1046-1049; Tiedeman, Mun. Corp. § 849; and Cooley, Torts, 2d ed. pp. 738-743.

The city of Richmond, in licensing the Richmond & Chesapeake Railroad Company, a corporation created and chartered by the sovereign power of the state, to enter and use its streets for its roadway, and to construct a tunnel to that end, having the power, under its charter, to grant such permission, exercised a public or governmental power, and the law exempts it from responsibility for an injury resulting from the negligence or wrongful act of the railroad company, unless such injury was also due to the failure of the city to discharge some ministerial and obligatory duty.

The court below therefore committed no error in refusing to give the instruction asked for by the plaintiff and in giving that asked for by the defendant, nor in refusing to set aside the verdict and award the plaintiff a new trial; and its judgment must be affirmed.

TENNESSEE SUPREME COURT.

TRADESMEN'S NATIONAL BANK

v.

R. F. LOONEY et al. (UNITED STATES NATIONAL BANK, Impleaded, etc., App't.).

(.....Tenn.....)

1. Enforcement of a note given as a subscription to the stock of a syndicate organized to purchase the property of a corporation, and which is used to pay for such property, cannot be defeated for fraudulent overvaluation of the property purchased, if the parties making the representation were representatives of the syndicate and not of the vendor corporation.

2. A purchase for value in due course of trade, of a note, is made by a bank which discounts it and applies the proceeds to the payment of a prior note due by the indorser and an over draft by a bank in which the indorser is interested.

3. A note is not subjected to equities in the hands of a holder for value by the fact that it is payable to a person, "trustee," if inquiry would have disclosed the fact that the word was merely descriptive, and that the note was made to him for the purpose of enabling him to turn it over in consummation of a subscription to the stock of a syndicate, which was accomplished by his indorsement and transfer.

4. The liability of the maker of a note to an indorsee is not affected by a compromise of a suit by the indorsee against the indorser, by which the latter is permitted to substitute securities in lieu of his liability as indorser under the express agreement that the liability of the maker shall not be affected, and that when any money is collected from the maker it shall be applied to release the securities so deposited.

5. The liability of the indorser of a note is not affected by the addition of the word "trustee" to his name.

NOTE.—As to the negotiability of a note payable to trustee, see Fox v. Citizens' Bank & T. Co. (Tenn. Ch. App.) 35 L. R. A. 673, and note.

6. Notice to the indorsee that an indorser has no interest in the transaction will not relieve the indorser from liability on a note.

(March 22, 1897.)

A PPEAL by defendant United States National Bank from a decree of the Chancery Court for Shelby County dismissing its cross bill and disallowing its claim in a suit brought to foreclose a trust deed securing payment of certain notes, one of which was held by the appellant. Reversed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. William M. Randolph & Sons, for appellant, United States National Bank:

A holder coming fairly by a bill or note has nothing to do with the transaction between the original parties, and if negotiable paper is transferred for a valuable consideration, and without notice of any fraud, the right of the holder shall prevail against the true owner.

The contracts between the syndicate and its several members, or between the syndicate and the Sheffield Land Iron & Coal Company made before the organization of the Sheffield City Company, did not become the contracts of that company, except so far as the company adopted and ratified them after its incorporation had been perfected.

Pittsburg & T. Copper Min. Co. v. Quintrell, 91 Tenn. 698.

Looney and the other members of the syndicate were the vendors, in substance, of the new company, the Sheffield City Company, with reference to the property they had agreed to buy from the old company, the Sheffield Land, Iron, & Coal Company.

So far from Looney and his coadjutors, members of the syndicate, having the right to complain of the failure to deliver the property, or of the defects in the title to the property, or of the deficiencies in the value of the property, as against the Sheffield City Company, that company had the right to make such complaint against Looney, and the other members, if, in fact, the property was not delivered, or the title to the property was not good, or its value was not such as it was represented to be, prior to the purchase.

Looney does not pretend he has ever returned the stock to the Sheffield City Company, or has ever attempted to do so, or has ever taken any step in the direction of canceling the transaction between him and the Sheffield City Company by which the stock was issued, and his notes were given, except his defense, as presented in the record of this suit, by his answers and his cross bills. That is sufficient to defeat this action.

Coffee v. Ruffin, 4 Coldw. 516; Hill v. Harri-man, 95 Tenn. 800; Farmer's Bank v. Groves, 53 U. S. 12 How. 51, 13 L. ed. 889; Gay v. Alter, 102 U. S. 79, 26 L. ed. 48.

Col. Looney was on the ground, and had an opportunity of ascertaining or knowing the truth of the statements made by him to Sykes, whether verbal or contained in his letters, or appearing from the schedule furnished, showing the property to be purchased, and the values set upon it.

If he chose to rely upon the information he got, without making the proper and necessary inquiries, it was his own fault, and he cannot now urge his negligence in that respect as a ground for defeating his liability upon the note held by the United States National Bank, an indorsee, who, as already shown, has paid value for it.

Looney had information enough to charge him with knowledge that the estimates were mere opinions by those who were communicating with him, and they might or might not turn out to be well founded. If he chose to rely upon those opinions, he had the right to do so, and to make the contract he did make upon the faith of them. But, because the opinions have turned out to be ill founded, and cannot be verified, he has no right to repudiate the contracts he made.

This suit is now prosecuted, primarily, for the benefit of the United States National Bank to the extent to which its indebtedness as shown by the note has not been paid; and secondarily, for the benefit of the Sheffield City Company to the extent to which that indebtedness has been paid. There can be no objection to such an arrangement.

The addition of the word "trustee" to Mr. Sykes's name does not preclude the United States National Bank from holding him as the indorser on the note.

The facts must be shown affirmatively by the proof, if there are any such facts, that Sykes was not in a position to be bound by the note, and that the United States National Bank acted in bad faith in ignoring such facts, and taking the note without inquiry with respect to them.

Accommodation paper is always put in circulation for the purpose of giving credit to the party for whose benefit it is intended. And although such party cannot maintain an action upon it against the accommodation maker or indorser, and would be defeated because of want of consideration, a purchaser can maintain an action, who acquires it while still current, and gives the credit it was intended to promote, although such purchaser has knowledge of the original character of the paper.

Beard, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The complainant, being the owner of a $12,500 note, being one of two notes of like amount executed by R. F. Looney to the order of J. P. Sykes, trustee, and by him and the Sheffield City Company indorsed to complainant, filed this bill, seeking a decree for the amount of this note and interest, and also for a foreclosure of a trust deed made to secure it. The bill alleges that this trust deed was executed by Looney and wife on certain real property belonging to the wife, in or near Memphis, and that this property was already, in part or in whole, covered by two other trust deeds; that J. P. Sykes, the indorser of this note, was also trustee in the trust deed; and that, though complainant's note was long past due, and full power of sale on such contingency was granted to the trustee, yet he declined to execute this power. Sykes, as indorser and as such trustee, Looney and wife, the trustees and beneficiaries in the other two trust deeds, and the United States National Bank, as the alleged holder of the other of these notes, were made parties to this bill. The claim of complainant not being before us, we need not pursue it further.

The United States National Bank filed an answer to the original bill, and made its answer a cross bill, in which it asked affirmative relief. In this answer and cross bill it was averred that the United States National Bank was the holder of the other of these two notes of $12,500, having acquired title thereto bona fide, for a valuable consideration, before maturity, and in due course of trade; that this note was also made payable to J. P. Sykes trustee; that it was by him and the Sheffield City Company indorsed; and that at maturity it was duly protested for nonpayment,—of all of which the indorser had legal notice. The cross bill prayed that the trust deed described in the original bill be foreclosed, and the proceeds of the foreclosure sale be applied to the payment of this note. To this cross bill Looney and wife and J. P. Sykes filed answers. In their answer, Looney and wife denied that the United States National Bank acquired this note in due course of trade, for value, and without notice of the makers' equitable defenses against it, and they averred that the note and trust deed to secure it were procured by fraud, and that no valuable consideration passed to them for the same. The fraud complained of, and as set out in the answer, is as follows: In July, 1892, and for some time before, there existed at Sheffield, Alabama, a corporation called the Sheffield Land, Iron, & Coal Company, which was the owner of various properties, real and personal. The operations of this corporation seem to have become embarrassed by heavy debts, the burden of which was largely carried by some of its stockholders. Certain of these parties about that time conceived the idea of relieving themselves of this burden by organizing a syndicate to purchase the assets of the corporation, and to this end they solicited a subscription from R. F. Looney, and perhaps others; and, in order that the parties so solicited might understand the character of the assets, there was prepared a statement or schedule of the same, together with extensions showing the value. In this paper these assets were set down as worth $1,012,676.81, and it is alleged that representations were made to Looney in this paper and otherwise by these gentlemen, that these values were in no sense speculative, but that they were real. In the answer it is also stated that it was in the same way represented that $800,000 would pay all the debts of the corporation, and that all the assets so scheduled would be turned over to the syndicate unencumbered, save for the burden of a bonded debt of $60,000 resting on the hotel in Sheffield and scheduled as part of these assets, which was to be taken care of by the syndicate, but that it was at the same time stated to him that the rents derived from the hotel property would be sufficient to pay the interest on these bonds. Relying on their statements, the answer avers that R. F. Looney subscribed for a share of $50,000 of and in the syndicate which was organized to purchase these assets at the sum of $800,000. The answer alleges that he was imposed upon greatly as to the value of these properties; that, instead of being worth over $1,000,000, they were worth greatly less, and, instead of being unencumbered save in the single particular referred to, they were in numerous instances, and to their full value, hypothecated to the creditors of this corporation. The answer also alleges that the debts much exceeded $800,000. It is unnecessary to enter further into the details of the misrepresentations of which he alleges he was made the victim, it being sufficient to say that they were numerous and very great. It is further stated in the answer that, by his subscription of $50,000 to the capital of the syndicate, Looney was to be interested in the assets purchased in the proportion that this sum bore to the full amount of $800,000, and that, to pay this subscription, he executed his notes for $50,000, including the two notes of $12,500 each, secured by the trust deed in question. Looney and wife also file a cross bill, in which they seek to have the notes delivered up for cancellation, and to have the trust deed removed as a cloud on Mrs. Looney's title. Sykes also answers the cross bill, and denies his liability as indorser, and avers that the United States National Bank took the note with full knowledge that his purpose in indorsing the note was simply to pass title, and in no respect to bind himself personally on it. The United States National Bank answered the cross bill of Looney and wife, denying its averments so far as they impeached its title to the note sued on, and it reiterated that it was the bona fide holder of this paper. Subsequently amended answers were filed by Looney and Sykes, in which they alleged that since the filing of their original answer they had ascertained that this note had been paid to the holder, the United States National Bank, and that it had no right to prosecute further its suit upon it; that the debt of the bank was originally a debt due from the Sheffield Land & Iron Company, and that this debt was assumed by the Sheffield City Company when it was organized; that this note, together with the other notes of Looney heretofore described, was obtained by the false representations of the promoters of the Sheffield City Company, and that the note sued on by the United States National Bank was transferred to it in settlement of the debt of the Sheffield Land & Iron Company which it had assumed; and that subsequently the bank had made an arrangement with the Sheffield City Company, as a result of which the note was fully discharged. Upon the hearing, after much proof was taken, the chancellor dismissed the cross bill of the United States National Bank, and, upon the cross bill of Looney, ordered the note to be canceled, as well as the deed of trust securing it. From this portion of the decree the bank has prosecuted its appeal to this court.

The first question that will be considered is, Do the facts disclosed in the record afford a defense against the note in the hands of the bank, even if it be conceded that it does not occupy the position of a bona fide holder for value? That Col. Looney was induced to go into a speculating scheme which will prove disastrous to him if the note in suit is enforced against him, is true. And it may be conceded that the evidence in the case shows that the inducement which operated upon him and led him into this venture was a great overvaluation of the property and of its income, and a serious undervaluation of the encumbrances on this property, made by parties in whom he reposed confidence. And it may be granted further that the record shows that he was informed that his subscription of $50,000 would complete the sum of $300,000 to be raised by the syndicate, and that this amount would be sufficient to discharge the liabilities of the Sheffield Land, Iron, & Coal Company, and that in neither respect was the statement true. But, granting all these as facts clearly made out, yet they are not of themselves sufficient to relieve him from liability on this note. To work this result, these misrepresentations must have been made by the vendor of this property or by someone authorized to act for it. On this point Col. Looney says that J. C. Neely and Napoleon Hill, of Memphis, and E. W. Cole, Lewis Baxter, and others, of Nashville, were stockholders in that company, and creditors of it (the three first named, in very large amounts), and that they induced Charles Sykes, who was then its president, and also a creditor of the company, to form a syndicate for the purpose of purchasing a part of the assets of the company, the object and purpose of the originators of the syndicate being to apply the purchase money they realized to the payment of the debts of the Sheffield Land, Iron, & Coal Company, all of which were a charge upon the entire property of that company, and leave a portion of its property "free of any encumbrance whatever." He further says that these parties solicited subscriptions from persons who were not creditors of the company, but that he knew of no one save himself, not a creditor, who took any interest in the syndicate. He also states in his deposition that he received two letters, one from Charles Sykes, whom he denominates "the promoter and organizer of the syndicate," and the other from J. C. Neely, a member of the syndicate, together with a schedule of assets that the syndicate proposed to buy, and that, relying on the truthfulness of the statements contained in these letters and in the schedule, he was induced to identify himself with the scheme. These letters were exhibited to the court by him. The letter of Sykes did not profess to come from him as the president, or in any other respect as the representative, of the selling company, but distinctly as the agent of the syndicate. He says in reference to the Sheffield Syndicate: "I beg to make the following statement: I was employed by some gentlemen who were interested in the town to go there and make an examination of the property offered, and, in addition, to make a conservative estimate of what could be realized from it. I had no idea of being interested in the company when I went down there. After looking the matter over thoroughly, I have agreed to put my money in it. I feel that, with careful management, I will get $3 out for every dollar I put in. You, in my opinion, need not hesitate to say to your friends that this is an exceptional opportunity to make big money." In his letter Mr. Neely says: "You ask me to say what I know about the Sheffield Syndicate, and will say in reply that I have known the town of Sheffield since it was first surveyed into lots. I have seen a schedule of property offered the syndicate for $300,000, and have seen the property, and know of its value. I think the property worth three times the amount valued above. I have subscribed myself, and would subscribe largely, had I the ready money in hand." The schedule of property referred to in these letters, and the one furnished by Sykes to Col. Looney, show the face or par value of the assets which the syndicate proposed to buy for the sum of $300,000 to be $2,450,023.51, and the estimated value to be $1,012,676.81. Not only this, but Mr. Charles Sykes, the promoter of this scheme, in his deposition taken in the interest of, and read in the bill of, Col. Looney, says: "I was employed by a syndicate to purchase the assets of the said Sheffield Land, Iron, & Coal Company, and the said syndicate purchased the assets and property from the Sheffield Land, Iron & Coal Company for the sum of $300,000, and paid the sum in cash, or the valid subsisting indebtedness of that company." It thus will be seen that whatever misrepresentations were the moving inducement to Col. Looney to enter into this unfortunate speculation came, not from the company selling these assets, but from his associates in the syndicate purchasing them. After a diligent examination of the record, we have not been able to discover a single misleading act or word of the vendor corporation, or anyone authorized to represent it, which induced this sale. It seems to have been the passive recipient of the consideration for its assets, and whatever of wrong there may have been in the transaction was practised upon Col. Looney by parties interested with him in the speculation. This being so, we know of no rule of law which would place upon the innocent vendor the responsibility of a fraud or misrepresentation practised by one or more of a number of vendees upon others associated with them in a purchase. And, even as to these parties, Col. Looney, in his deposition, repeatedly acquits them of all intention to wrong or defraud him, but says that he is satisfied they thought they would bring him out all right. In addition, however, the record shows that the trade with the Sheffield Land, Iron, & Coal Company was consummated, and that the assets purchased were conveyed by that company to one Cheany, and that he at once conveyed them to a new corporation organized as was contemplated by the parties composing the syndicate, and known as the Sheffield City Company, and that company accepted them at the valuation of $1,000,000, and, upon the basis of this valuation, issued $150,000 of its capital stock to Col. Looney, as representing his interest in the institution. It is true, this stock was not actually turned over to him, but was held as collateral to his notes, yet it was receipted for by him, and was thus recognized by him as the fruit of his investment.

But, independent of the question just considered, this defense cannot be maintained against the United States National Bank. The facts with regard to the ownership of the note sued on by that bank are as follows: In October, 1892, this bank was the owner and holder of a note of the Sheffield Land, Iron, & Coal Company for the sum of $11,891.82, besides interest; and at the same time it held a claim, in the shape of an overdraft, against the Bank of Commerce of Sheffield, Alabama, for $3,790.91. In this latter bank the Sheffield Land, Iron, & Coal Company held a controlling interest. Mr. Sykes, representing a new corporation called the Sheffield City Company, to which the Looney notes had been assigned, proposed to the officers of the United States National Bank that, if they would discount the note of $12,500 here sued on, the proceeds of the discount might be applied to the extinguishment, pro tanto, of the two debts just mentioned, and that the excess of indebtedness over the discount would be paid to it in cash. This proposition was accepted by the United States National Bank, and the arrangement suggested was carried out in every respect. The bank thus received this note and the cash necessary to complete the transaction, and at the same time surrendered to the Sheffield City Company, as an extinguished liability, the note of the Sheffield Land, Iron, & Coal Company, and certain collateral attached to it, including its claim against the Bank of Commerce. The note of Col. Looney was indorsed by its payee and by the Sheffield City Company, before its maturity, to this bank, and was taken by it without any notice of the circumstances under which it had been obtained. Premitting for the moment the effect on its negotiability of the fact that this note was made payable to "Joseph Sykes, Trustee," and so indorsed by him, there is no question but that the facts just detailed make this bank a bona fide holder for value. The extinguishment of the note of the Sheffield Land, Iron, & Coal Company, and the surrender of the collateral to secure it, and the discharge of the Bank of Commerce from liability on its overdraft, constituted the United States National Bank a purchaser for value, in due course of trade, of this note. This proposition is clearly established in this state. Nichol v. Bate, 10 Yerg. 429; Cherry v. Frost, 7 Lea, 1; Jordan v. Jordan, 10 Lea, 184, 48 Am. Rep. 294, and Lookout Bank v. Aull, 98 Tenn. 646. But it is said that the fact that this note was payable to "Joseph Sykes, Trustee," and was so indorsed by him, of itself lets in against the bank all equities that would have attached to it in the hands of the original parties; and the cases of Alexander v. Alderson, 7 Baxt. 403; Covington v. Anderson, 16 Lea, 310; and Caulkins v. Memphis Gaslight Co. 85 Tenn. 684, are cited as sustaining this contention. All of these cases involve controversies between the owners of trust funds and parties who set up a title to such funds by transfer from trustees in fraud of their trusts, and where the paper transferred or assigned on its face gave notice of the existence of a trust. Alexander v. Alderson, 7 Baxt. 403, was a case of a note payable to Alexander, trustee, and by him assigned in payment of an individual liability; and the question there was, Were the indorsees bona fide holders of the note, so as to be able to resist the claim of the beneficiaries? Upon the authority of Duncan v. Jaudon, 83 U. S. 15 Wall. 175, 21 L. ed. 145, this court held that the word "trustee" gave notice of the existence of a trust, and that the party taking the paper was charged with the duty of ascertaining what, if any, restrictions were imposed on the trustee in the management of the trust. To like effect are Covington v. Anderson, 16 Lea, 310, and Caulkins v. Memphis Gaslight Co. 85 Tenn. 684. None of these cases, however, involve the question we have here. Similar to them is the case of Third Nat. Bank v. Lange, 51 Md. 188, 34 Am. Rep. 304. There a trustee violated his duty by disposing of a note payable to himself as trustee, and it was said by the court: "It [the note] cannot be read understandingly without seeing upon its face that it is connected with a trust and is a part of a trust fund. It was the duty of the bank, before purchasing it, to have made inquiry into the right of the trustee to dispose of it." The correctness of these holdings is now conceded by the courts with practical unanimity. The effect of them is that if the trustee, Sykes, disposed of this paper in violation of his trust, then the word "trustee" would convert any one who so obtained it into a constructive trustee, at the instance of the cestui que trust. But it is certainly true, as Mr. Perry says: "The mere fact that the word trustee is on the face of the securities cannot put a purchaser to any inquiry beyond ascertaining whether the trustee has power to vary the securities. If he has such power, a purchaser in good faith will be protected, although the trustee use the money for his private purposes. But if a purchaser takes securities from a trustee, with the word 'trustee' upon their face, in payment of a private debt due from the trustee, the sale may be avoided by the cestui que trust, or the purchaser may be held as a trustee." 1 Perry, Tr. § 225. Here we find an intelligent statement of the rule and its limitations. The rule is that he who takes a security from a trustee, with his fiduciary character displayed upon its face, is bound to inquire as to his right to dispose of it, but if, on inquiry, it is found that there is no restriction upon the trustee's power of disposition, or (it may be added) there is nothing in the nature of the transaction to indicate any abuse of his trust, then the title of a purchaser in good faith, for value and before maturing, will be protected.

In the case at bar an inquiry would have disclosed that the word "trustee," in this connection, was purely descriptive, and without any legal signification, and that the trust deed executed by Col. Looney and wife was in the ordinary form, made to Sykes as trustee, conveying to him certain real estate of Mrs. Looney's, with this recital: "That whereas, R. F. Looney, Sr., has subscribed $50,000 towards the formation of a syndicate for the purchase of the assets of the Sheffield Land, Iron, & Coal Company, and to this end has executed his two several promissory notes for $12,500 each, due in six months from date, payable to the order of Joseph P. Sykes, trustee, which said two notes are a part of the $50,000 subscription: Now, in order to make certain the payment of said two notes," etc., "we hereby bargain and convey unto the said Jos. P. Sykes, trustee," etc. In other words, an examination would have disclosed neither upon the face of this trust deed, nor elsewhere in the transaction, any restriction upon the power of the payee, Sykes, nor any limitation upon his right to indorse and turn over the note in question for the consummation of Col. Looney's subscription to the syndicate, but, on the contrary, that it was made for that purpose and no other. The record showing that the note in suit and the others mentioned were delivered to Mr. Sykes, the constituted representative of the syndicate, to be transferred by him in payment of Col. Looney's subscription thereto, and that they were so used, and that the note sued on passed, under the circumstances already detailed, into the hands of the cross-complainant bank, its title will be protected. This principle or rule was recognized by us in affirming the decree of the court of chancery appeals in Fox v. Citizens' Bank & T. Co. (Tenn. Ch. App.) 35 L. R. A. 678. And see Downer v. Read, 17 Minn. 493 (Gil. 470); Davis v. Garr, 6 N. Y. 124, 55 Am. Dec. 387; Westmoreland v. Foster, 60 Ala. 448.

But it is insisted that at least a settlement made between the United States National Bank and the Sheffield City Company dated January 31, 1895, extinguished this note, so far as Looney and his accommodation indorser, Sykes, were concerned. It will be remembered that this note was transferred to its present holder by the Sheffield City Company, the last indorser. By the terms of the agreement or settlement, as it is called, the Sheffield City Company was permitted to substitute, with the bank, certain securities it owned in the place and stead of its guaranty or indorsement of this note, and the bank obligated itself not to sue on the guaranty or indorsement, but it was expressly stipulated that this settlement was in no way to affect the liability of the other parties to the note. It was also agreed that, as money was collected from the other parties, it should be credited to the Sheffield City Company, and a like amount of its securities should be returned to it. In other words, this agreement simply substituted certain securities of the Sheffield City Company for its general liability as indorser, and secured for it a dismissal of a suit then pending to enforce this liability, but in no way affected the relations of the other parties to this note. This leaves undetermined alone the question of the extent of the obligation of J. P. Sykes on this note. Did the addition of the word "trustee" to his name limit his responsibility as its indorser? He waived demand and notice of protest by a writing when he indorsed it, so that his liability was fixed on the maturity and nonpayment of the note, unless it be that the addition of the word "trustee" relieves him. This question is settled against the indorser by the great weight of authority. Taft v. Brewster, 9 Johns. 384, 6 Am. Dec. 280, was a case of parties signing a bond as trustee of the Baptist Society, etc., and the court said: "The bond must be considered as given by the defendants in their individual capacities. It is not the bond of the Baptist church, and if the defendants are not bound, the church certainly is not. . . . The addition of trustees to the names of the defendants is in this case a mere descriptio personarum." In McClure v. Bennett, 1 Blackf. 189, 12 Am. Dec. 223, makers of a note appended to their names the words, "Trustees of the First Presbyterian Church of Madison," and yet they were made personally liable. And in Conner v. Clark, 12 Cal. 168, 78 Am. Dec. 529, the court held that a party signing a note with the word "trustee" added was individually bound, and evidence was inadmissible to show that at the time he affixed his signature there was an agreement that he should not be liable personally, but that the note should be paid out of a trust fund. In this last case the court quoted at length from § 63, Story, Prom. Notes, as follows: "As to trustees, guardians, executors, and administrators, and other persons acting as en autre droit, they are by law generally held personally liable on promissory notes; because they have no authority to bind, ex directo, the persons for whom, or for whose benefit, or for whose estate, they act; and hence, to give any validity to the note, they must be deemed personally bound as makers. It is true that they may exempt themselves from personal responsibility by using clear and explicit words to show that intention; but, in the absence of such words the law will hold them bound." To the same effect is Binney v. Plumley, 5 Vt. 500, 26 Am. Dec. 813; Clap v. Day, 2 Me. 305, 11 Am. Dec. 99. So in this state it has been held that a note signed with the word "administrator" or "guardian" affixed to the name of the maker is the latter's personal note. Erwin v. Carroll, 1 Yerg. 145; McWhirter v. Jackson, 10 Humph. 209; Carter v. Wolfe, 1 Heisk. 694. Nor does it affect the liability of the indorser on this paper that the knowledge was communicated to the bank, when this note was delivered to it, that Mr. Sykes had no interest in the transaction of which it formed a part; for it is clear that notice to a bank discounting accommodation paper that the indorser is lending his credit to the maker does not affect the bank or relieve the indorser. Philler v. Patterson, 168 Pa. 463.

The result is that the chancellor's decree, dismissing the cross bill of the United States National Bank, and sustaining the respective cross bills of Looney and wife and Sykes and Buchanan and others, is reversed, and a decree will be entered here, in accordance with the prayer of the first one of these cross bills, in favor of the United States National Bank.

NORTH DAKOTA SUPREME COURT

BANK OF GILBY, Appt.,

S. L. FARNSWORTH, Respt

(.....N. D.....)

1. A draft drawn by defendant to the order of the plaintiff was lost in transmission by mail from the city where the plaintiff was engaged in business to the city where the drawee resided, to be there presented for payment by the plaintiff's correspondent. Plaintiff failed to discover such loss for nearly six months, although it had in its possession a report from its correspondent which disclosed the fact that the draft had never reached such correspondent. Held, that the drawer was discharged from liability.

2. When a drawer who has been discharged because of the failure to take the necessary steps to charge him, promises to pay the draft or recognizes his liability thereon, with full knowledge of the facts releasing him from liability, he thereby waives his right to insist that he has been released.

3. The giving by the drawer of a duplicate of the lost draft does not necessarily evince a purpose to waive such defense. Such duplicate does not, as a matter of law, import a promise to pay the draft. Therefore it is competent to show by parole evidence that the drawer informed the payee that he did not intend by the giving thereof to waive his rights, but merely to accommodate the payee by putting in his hands a paper which would enable him to collect the money from the drawee.

4. Such evidence does not contradict or vary the terms of the written contract between the parties, for there is only one contract between them,—4. c., the original draft,—the duplicate adding nothing to the liability of the drawer, and not constituting a new or additional contract.

(October 21, 1897.)

APPEAL by plaintiff from a judgment of the District Court for Grand Forks County in favor of defendant in an action brought to enforce defendant's alleged liability as drawer of a draft. Affirmed.

Messrs. J. B. Wineman and Charles F. Templeton, for appellant:

The failure of plaintiff to present the original bill was caused by circumstances over which it had no control and judgment should be awarded in its favor.

The oral promise of defendant to execute a duplicate of the original bill of exchange, having knowledge of the facts, was a waiver of any laches attributable to plaintiff on account of failure to present the bill to Gagan & Company for acceptance and give notice of its non-payment to defendant.

The drawing of the duplicate draft, on April 1, 1896, and delivery to plaintiff, was a waiver by defendant of the defense which he now sets up.

Corliss, Ch. J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The plaintiff by this action is seeking to hold the defendant liable as drawer of a draft. The plaintiff is the payee named in such draft, and it was drawn on J. M. Gagen & Co., of Grand Forks city, the defendant being a resident of Gilby, North Dakota. Defendant had been engaged in buying wheat for J. M. Gagen & Co. for some time previous to the day when this draft was drawn. It was his custom to advance the money with which to make all purchases of wheat for his principal, and at the close of the day to draw upon them a draft through the plaintiff, a state bank at Gilby, to reimburse him for such advances. On the 26th of September, 1895, the moneys he had that day expended in buying wheat for his principal amounted at the close thereof to the sum of $612, and on that day he drew upon them, through the Gilby bank, for that amount, that bank cashing the draft, as was its custom. The draft was lost in transmission by mail from Gilby to Grand Forks, it being forwarded by plaintiff to the First National Bank of Grand Forks for collection. The fact of such loss was not discovered by plaintiff until the latter part of March, 1896, or nearly, if not quite, six months afterwards. As soon as plaintiff learned that the draft had not been received by its agent, the First National Bank of Grand Forks, it notified the defendant, and requested him to give a duplicate thereof. Defendant refused so to do until he had ascertained whether the draft had in fact not been paid. Subsequently he signed and delivered to plaintiff an exact duplicate of the lost draft, it being dated as of the 26th of September, 1895, the same as the original. Written upon the draft in two places was the word "Duplicate." Defendant testified, and his evidence was confirmed by that of his son, that he distinctly informed the plaintiff that he knew that he had been discharged from liability on the lost draft by reason of the negligence of the plaintiff, and that he did not intend, by the giving of the duplicate, to reinstate such liability. The evidence on this point is somewhat conflicting, but the learned trial judge, having all except one of the witnesses before him, found in favor of the defendant on this point. In a case where the evidence is so evenly balanced, we should not overthrow a finding of fact which necessarily rests in part upon a knowledge of the demeanor and appearance of witnesses which we do not and cannot possess. That the defendant was discharged from liability as drawer does not admit of doubt. Under the statute it was the duty of the plaintiff to present the bill for payment within ten days after the time in which it could, with reasonable diligence, forward it to Grand Forks for such presentation. The draft was payable on demand, and did not draw interest. Our statute declares that, "if a bill of exchange payable at sight or on demand without interest is not duly presented for payment within ten days after the time in which it could with reasonable diligence be transmitted to the proper place for such presentation, the drawer and indorsers are exonerated, unless such presentment is excused." Rev. Codes, § 4941. Nor does the loss of the paper exonerate the plaintiff from the performance of this duty, which it owed the defendant. "The loss of a bill or note is no excuse for want of a demand, protest, or notice, because it does not change the contract of the parties, and the drawer and indorsers will be at once discharged if there be failure in respect of either the demand, protest, or notice. This rule applies whether the bill has been accepted or not, for the loss of the instrument does not relax the duty of the holder to make the demand for acceptance within due season." 2 Dan. Neg. Inst. § 1464. It is possible that the time during which plaintiff remained in ignorance of the fact of such loss, without being chargeable with negligence, was not a part of the time mentioned in the statute. Probably § 4909, Revised Codes, covers such a case. This section reads: "Delay in presentment or in giving notice of dishonor is excused when caused by circumstances which the party delaying could not have avoided by the exercise of reasonable care and diligence." It may be that the holder of a draft is not responsible for the carelessness of public servants in the carrying of the mails, and therefore that he does not take the risk of such carelessness. But the moment the exercise of reasonable diligence requires him to know the fact that the paper has been lost, he must then proceed under the statute to make the demand of payment, and give notice of dishonor. This duty the section referred to clearly recognizes. It is only when the delay is caused by circumstances which the party delaying could not have avoided by the exercise of reasonable care and diligence that he is excused. It is a mild form of expression to speak of the negligence of the plaintiff in failing to discover for six months the fact that this draft had never been paid, and had not even reached its correspondent and agent, the First National Bank of Grand Forks. Nearly six months intervened between the mailing of the draft and the discovery of its loss, during about five months of which time plaintiff's cashier admits that there was in his possession a statement from the First National Bank which would have disclosed the fact that that bank had never received the paper. From the standpoint of the defendant's rights and interest, the plaintiff was guilty of gross and inexcusable negligence; and defendant was thereby discharged from all liability on the paper. But it is urged that to allow the defendant to prove the oral understanding between him and the plaintiff's cashier at the time of the delivery of the duplicate draft is to contradict by parol evidence the terms of a written instrument. This contention must find support, if at all, in the postulate that the duplicate draft was an independent contract, creating an additional liability. This position is not tenable. All the evidence in the case, the duplicate itself, and the plaintiff's own pleading, speak but one language regarding the paper. It is not a new agreement, but merely a written evidence of the lost instrument executed to take its place. After a contract is duly entered into, the making of a duplicate adds nothing to the liability of any of the parties to the agreement. There is still only one contract, although for convenience of the parties there may be two, or even more, original agreements, each the exact copy of all the others. Burrill defines a duplicate as "an original instrument repeated; a document which is the same as another in all essential particulars, and differing from a mere copy in having all the validity of an original." It is immaterial when a duplicate is executed. If it is in fact a duplicate, it adds no more to the obligations and rights of the parties to the agreement, when it is executed at a subsequent date, than when its execution is contemporaneous with that of the other duplicate. Suppose that the defendant had been properly charged as drawee, and that thereafter the draft had been lost, would it be claimed that the execution by defendant of a duplicate under those circumstances would have added anything to his liability, or that the duplicate would have been a new and distinct contract? Clearly not; otherwise he would then be liable for twice the sum for which he had received consideration. The mere fact that the duplicate was executed after he had been discharged cannot make it a separate and independent agreement, although the execution thereof might, under some circumstances, be cogent evidence that the drawer had intended to admit his liability, and thus, under a familiar rule, waive his discharge. That, however, is another question having no connection whatever with the inquiry whether the defendant, by signing and delivering this duplicate as a duplicate, and as a duplicate only, has nevertheless entered into a new contract creating a distinct liability. That no new agreement was made by the execution of this duplicate cannot admit of doubt. All that was done was to furnish the plaintiff with a copy of the lost paper; a copy, however, which has all the force (and no more) of the original, because signed by the defendant, the same as this old draft. Therefore the defendant's evidence, that he stated before signing the duplicate that he did not thereby intend to add anything to his liability, was in harmony with the very nature of the act of executing a duplicate, and not in conflict therewith. His evidence was not incompetent on the ground that it tended to contradict or vary the terms of a written agreement. Clearly, his evidence, that he informed the plaintiff before the delivery of the duplicate that he knew that he had been released from liability, and did not intend to yield his vantage ground by the execution of such duplicate, was not evidence which in any manner varied or contradicted the terms of the only contract between the parties. That contract was the original draft. By signing the duplicate, the defendant, as we have before stated, did not make a new agreement or add anything to the old. He merely gave another written evidence thereof. Therefore the contract between the parties whose terms can be varied by the oral evidence in the case is the draft drawn September 26, 1895. But defendant does not seek to add to or take from this agreement one iota. He concedes that it is a fair contract, and that it means just what the law says it means. But he asserts that the condition on which the liability thereunder was to become absolute has not been fulfilled, and that, therefore, he has been released as drawer of the draft. What he sought to prove was, not that the original draft was delivered on condition, or did not represent the real intent of the parties thereto, but that, by giving a duplicate, he did not intend to waive his right to insist that he had been exonerated from liability by the laches of the plaintiff.

Counsel for plaintiff treats the duplicate as a new contract, and then reasons that it imports an absolute liability on the part of the defendant, provided the proper steps were taken to charge him as drawer. Here is the fallacy of his reasoning. The postulate is false. It is no more a distinct contract than it would have been had it been executed at the same time that the lost paper was executed. As a new contract, it would have no consideration to support it. It is undisputed that no money was paid for the duplicate by the plaintiff. Nor was defendant under any moral, much less any legal, obligation to give it. He had been discharged through the gross carelessness of plaintiff; and the circumstances of the case show that, if the bank had acted with ordinary diligence, the loss of the draft would have been discovered in ample time to insure the collection of the money from J. M. Gagen & Co., as it is uncontradicted that between the time it was given and their suspension of business through insolvency they paid seventy-four drafts drawn on them by defendant. There might have rested upon defendant a certain business obligation to accommodate the bank by giving to it some written evidence that the bank was entitled to $612 of the funds of the defendant in the hands of J. M. Gagen & Co. But neither legally nor morally was defendant bound to pay a dollar, or in any manner help the plaintiff, by again becoming responsible, out of the dilemma in which it had placed itself by its own inexcusable negligence. If, therefore, we could treat this duplicate as an independent contract, it would be void as between the parties for want of a consideration to support it. But it is idle to talk of its being a new contract. The whole trend of the evidence, the writing of the word "Duplicate" on the paper itself, and the solemn averments of the plaintiff's own pleading, all point to one conclusion: i. e., that all that the parties intended was to make a duplicate of a draft which had theretofore been executed, and delivered by defendant to plaintiff. Plaintiff, in its complaint, avers "that on the last day of April, A. D. 1892, the defendant executed and delivered to the plaintiff a duplicate of said bill of exchange for the purpose of presenting the same to said J. M. Gagen & Co., and collecting from said J. M. Gagen & Co. the said sum of $612." We must, if we are not to lose ourselves in a labyrinth, take this duplicate, and assume it to have been executed as of the date of the lost draft, in considering the question whether there has been an attempt on the part of the defendant to contradict or vary by parol evidence the terms of a written agreement. But what effect the execution of this paper has to restore the liability of the defendant as drawer is another question, which must be discussed entirely separate from the question of parol evidence. On this branch of the case the time when the duplicate was executed is very important. If it had been signed when the lost draft was signed, no one would contend that it was any evidence of waiver. But, as it appears to have been executed at a time when the defendant knew that he had been released as drawer, there is a possibility of claiming that he thereby intended to admit his liability despite the fact that he had been discharged. If the paper were a note, and the defendant were an indorser thereon, his indorsing of a duplicate would be strong, perhaps conclusive, evidence that he intended thereby to admit his liability, although he had been discharged. In such a case there would be no other plausible explanation of his conduct. But in the case at bar there was a sufficient reason why the plaintiff should desire, and the defendant be willing to give, a duplicate, aside from a purpose to re-establish an extinguished liability. It was necessary that plaintiff should have some written authority from defendant to enable it to collect from J. M. Gagen & Co. $612 of the funds of defendant in their hands. For this purpose a duplicate was a very natural paper to give, for it would keep the records of all the parties in proper business shape. An order or an assignment would have been sufficient to enable the plaintiff to collect from J. M. Gagen & Co. the $612, but a duplicate of the original draft was the most natural document for the parties to select to effectuate this object. It was entirely competent for the defendant, at the time of giving it, to notify the plaintiff that he did not intend by the giving of such duplicate to waive his rights, but that his sole object was to put the plaintiff in shape to secure its money from J. M. Gagen & Co. According to his evidence, it was solely for this purpose that the plaintiff asked for the duplicate. It is possible that in this case the inference might be drawn from the bare fact of giving a duplicate under the circumstances of this case that defendant intended to abandon his defense that he had been released. But this would not be on account of the terms of the paper, or of its legal effect. Nor would it follow as a legal conclusion from the giving of a duplicate. That would be merely a circumstance having certain probative force, and evidence to overthrow the inference would be competent. Such evidence would only go to show that what on the face of the transaction was presumably the intention of the defendant was not in fact his intention, and that the plaintiff knew that it was not. Unless a duplicate draft, as a matter of law, constitutes a promise to pay despite the release of the drawer, —unless this is the legal effect of such an instrument,—the parol evidence did not in any manner contradict or vary its terms. Now, it is obvious that a draft does not contain any promise by the drawer to be bound despite a prior discharge, for at the time it is given the drawer is never released. And the duplicate draft is not a new contract, but another copy of the original, signed like the original by the drawer. As a contract it imports nothing more than the original draft. As evidence of a purpose to waive a discharge it will have such force as other evidence and other circumstances in the case permit, and no other or different force. And proof of other facts bearing upon the question of waiver in no manner affects the terms or legal effect of the only contract between the parties, i. e., the original draft which has been lost. The decision of the New York court of appeals in Benton v. Martin, 40 N. Y. 845, 52 N. Y. 570, is a direct authority in support of our decision. It is true that, when the case was before the court of appeals the last time (52 N. Y. 570), Judge Folger appears to have thought that the doctrine that it is competent to prove that a written instrument was delivered conditionally has some bearing on the case, and it may be doubtful, in view of our statutes, whether that doctrine prevails in this state. See Rev. Codes, §§ 8517, 3889, 3890. But no such foundation for the decision was stated by the court in the decision in 40 N. Y. 845. Nor can we perceive how it is possible to talk about the conditional delivery of a mere duplicate of an actually delivered and perfectly valid contract, one which had previously taken effect without condition. The delivery in that case was not conditional in the sense of the doctrine referred to, or, indeed, in any sense whatsoever. The drawer of the draft in that case merely asserted that, while he recognized the fact that he had once been liable on a draft issued by him, and which had theretofore been delivered unconditionally, and while he was willing to give the payee a duplicate to enable it to obtain its money from the drawee, yet he wished it understood that he did not intend to have his act of accommodation construed as a recognition of the very liability from which he had been, by the payee's carelessness, released. Here was no condition, but merely a refusal to have his act, which was not necessarily an admission of liability, construed as such an admission. The duplicate was not delivered as a contract. The delivery of the contract had already taken place months before. How, then, can it be said that any question of conditional delivery is involved in a case of this kind? What was done in that case and in this was not the delivering of a contract, thus for the first time making it effectual, but the furnishing of a duplicate of a contract which had been unconditionally delivered some time before. Such a thing as the conditional delivery of a duplicate, the contract already having taken effect by an unqualified delivery, is an utter impossibility. The defendant attached no condition to the delivery of the duplicate.

He merely guarded against the possibility of having his act in so doing construed as a recognition of liability, and hence, under the authorities, as a waiver of his discharge. Certainly, the furnishing of a duplicate of a lost draft is an act susceptible of two different constructions. It may indicate a purpose to reinstate an extinguished liability, or it may be an act of accommodation to the payee to enable him to obtain the funds of the drawee in the hands of the drawer from such drawee, the payee being equitably entitled thereto. Surely, evidence which throws light on this ambiguous transaction should not be excluded, nor is there any rule of law requiring this to be done. Had the defendant in express terms promised in writing to pay the draft, then it might be claimed that parol evidence tending to show that he did not mean what he said would fall within the rule excluding parol evidence to contradict a written instrument. But no such promise is found on the face of the duplicate, nor is one necessarily implied by the law. Whether such a promise was intended to be made,—whether it has, in fact, been made,—is to be gathered from all the circumstances of the case; and no act indecisive in character can control to the exclusion of other equally good, or rather of more satisfactory and explicit, evidence. It is unjustifiable to force upon the defendant an intention to yield up his defense merely because he gave the plaintiff a copy of the original draft, when such act could be and was in fact an act of pure accommodation to the plaintiff. It must be kept in mind that it does not take a contract to reinstate an extinguished liability of this character. No new consideration is necessary. No agreement on the part of the other party (the creditor) is essential. All that is needed is that the drawer should manifest a purpose to be bound notwithstanding the fact that the holder has failed to charge him as drawer. 2 Dan. Neg. Inst. §§ 1147, 1147a, and cases cited. How, then, has the doctrine relating to parol evidence any bearing on the question whether the drawer has in fact evinced a purpose to surrender his impregnable position? It is urged that the cashier of the bank had no power to bind it by agreeing that the delivery of the duplicate should not constitute a waiver of the drawer's defense. It is certainly remarkable if a principal can in this way force upon a party an agreement or waiver he never intended. Want of power in the agent will entitle the principal to claim that he is not bound. But it has remained for counsel for the plaintiff to discover that it likewise enables the principal to insist that another who has dealt with the agent has made a contract to which he (such other party) has never assented, or has in law agreed to a waiver which he has expressly guarded against. When defendant and plaintiff's cashier came together, defendant had been relieved from all liability to the plaintiff; and whatever rights the plaintiff has obtained have accrued to it through the dealing of the defendant with such cashier. It can take only such rights as the defendant has seen fit to confer upon it. Claiming the benefit of this arrangement, it must take with it all its conditions. As the defendant declared to the cashier that he would not waive his discharge, the plaintiff cannot, on account of any want of power in the agent, transmute this refusal to waive into a waiver in fact.

As the defendant was discharged from liability, and as he has not waived his right to rely on such discharge, the judgment of the district court in his favor must be affirmed.

All concur.

IOWA SUPREME COURT.

J. W. NEASHAM, Appt.,

Anna I. McNAIR.

(.....Iowa.....)

A diamond shirt stud procured for personal use and actually used and worn by a husband, is a family expense within the meaning of Code, § 214, charging family expenses upon the property of both husband and wife or either of them.

(Robinson, J., dissents.)

(October 30, 1897.)

APPEAL by plaintiff from a judgment of the District Court for Wapello County in favor of defendant in an action brought to recover the purchase price of jewelry sold by plaintiff to defendant's husband. Reversed.

NOTE.—As to liability of wife for family expenses, see Dodd v. St. John (Or.) 15 L. R. A. 717, and note.

Statement by Ladd, J.

The petition alleges that the defendants are husband and wife, a family of large fortune, high social rank, and luxurious habits; that O. E. McNair purchased an article of jewelry for his personal use and adornment, and used the same for such purpose; that he afterwards executed a note therefor, no part of which has been paid. It was admitted that the article referred to is a diamond shirt stud. Anna I. McNair demurred on the ground that such stud is not an expense for the payment of which she is liable. The plaintiff elected to stand on the ruling by which the demurrer was sustained, and appeals from the judgment dismissing the petition.

Messrs. Work & Lewis, for appellant: Jewelry is a family expense chargeable to both husband and wife.

Marquardt v. Flaughner, 60 Iowa, 148.

This court has held in Smedley v. Fell, 41 Iowa, 588, that a piano and spread which cost $389.80 was a family expense.

In Frost v. Parker, 65 Iowa, 178, this court holds that an organ is a family expense.

In Schrader v. Hoover, 80 Iowa, 243, a case for medical services for the wife ordered by the husband, the court made the right to recover to depend upon whether the "wife's condition was such that it was necessary and proper for her to have such attendance and service." This court holds that, thus limited, the instruction was erroneous and says: "The only question under the statute is, Was the claim of plaintiff a family expense? That it was a family expense seems to be conceded by the instruction, and there can be no doubt that thus far the instruction is correct.

Mr. W. S. Coen for appellee.

Ladd, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

Is a diamond shirt stud, worn by the husband for personal use and adornment, an expense of the family, for which the wife may be liable? Section 2214 of the Code of 1873 provides that "the expense of the family and the education of the children are chargeable upon the property of both husband and wife, or either of them, and in relation thereto they may be sued jointly or separately." At common law the husband was liable for any expense incurred in the clothing and maintenance of the wife and children, suitable to his situation in life. The term "necessaries" was not confined to food and clothing, but was construed to include articles of utility and ornament ordinarily enjoyed by families of persons of estate and station similar to that of the husband. The wife, however, was not chargeable for necessaries, and there was no remedy for articles purchased by her and used in the family, when not included in that term. The statute obviates determining the vexatious question of what are necessaries, and affords an inadequate remedy against both husband and wife. Smedley v. Felt, 41 Iowa, 588; Schrader v. Hoover, 80 Iowa, 243; Blackley v. Laba, 68 Iowa, 22, 50 Am. Rep. 724; Devendorf v. Emerson, 66 Iowa, 698. The expense, however, is limited to that of the family, and must have been incurred for something used therein or kept for use or beneficial thereto, and may include articles which enhance domestic comfort and increase social enjoyment. Fitzgerald v. McCarthy, 55 Iowa, 702; Smedley v. Felt, 41 Iowa, 588. In the latter case a piano was adjudged a family expense. "Family" is defined as a collective body of persons who live in one home under one head or manager. Menefee v. Chesley, 98 Iowa, 55, and authorities cited. That husband and wife, when living together, as they are presumed to do, are both members of the family, and included in this definition, will not be questioned. Necessaries for which the husband was liable will certainly now be conceded to be a part of the family expense. Clothing seems to have been treated as such. Finn v. Rose, 12 Iowa, 565; Devendorf v. Emerson, 66 Iowa, 698; Smedley v. Felt, 41 Iowa, 588. It is said that this is beneficial to each member only, and not to the entire household. The clothing of every member is a source of comfort and enjoyment to all. It is as essential as the food placed on the table.

Indeed, the services of a physician to one member of the family have been deemed a family expense; and so a watch and chain used by the wife and daughter only. Schrader v. Hoover, 80 Iowa, 243; Marquardt v. Flaughner, 60 Iowa, 148. Wearing apparel is not confined in its meaning to clothing, but includes the idea of ornamentation as well. A watch and chain have been adjudged such. Brown v. Edmonds, 8 S. D. 271; Stewart v. McClung, 12 Or. 431, 53 Am. Rep. 374; Bumpus v. Maynard, 33 Barb. 626. Contra, see Smith v. Rogers, 16 Ga. 480; Rothchild v. Boelter, 18 Minn. 361 (Gil. 831); Gooch v. Gooch, 83 Me. 535; Sawyer v. Sawyer, 28 Vt. 252. See 29 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law, p. 38. In Sawyer v. Sawyer, 28 Vt. 252, a breastpin is held to be a part of the wearing apparel of a deceased husband, which, under the Vermont statute, goes to the widow. But the supreme court of New Hampshire adjudged a breastpin not to be "wearing apparel necessary for the debtor and his family." Towns v. Pratt [33 N. H. 345], 66 Am. Dec. 720. The question of value and necessity is somewhat controlling in some of the cases referred to. By "wearing apparel" is usually meant clothing and garments protecting the person from exposure and not articles of ornament merely. Originally it included, not only the vesture, but all the ornaments and decorations worn with it. That jewelry, when of no purpose other than that of ornament, as a ring, will not be so classified, may be conceded. But if it serves the double purpose of being an article of use, in fastening the garments, or otherwise, and also of adornment to the person there appears no good reason for not adjudging it a part of the wearing apparel; else much that is pleasing in dress must be excluded from the meaning of the word, as generally accepted. The ornamentation of a lady's wardrobe is of little utility, yet it is always included in the term. If an article of jewelry is used with and as a part of the clothing, it may well be deemed a portion of the wearing apparel. It may thus serve as necessary and useful a purpose as the garments themselves. Articles of jewelry were of ten adjudged necessities for which the husband was liable at common law. Raynes v. Bennett, 114 Mass. 424; Porter v. Briggs, 38 Iowa, 186, 18 Am. Rep. 27. These are quite as commonly worn by many people as the clothing that covers them. The make of a shirt or the taste of the wearer may be such as to require some kind of a button or stud. If the inexpensive pearl were used, no one would question the propriety of making it a family charge. But it might be as much out of place in the shirt front of a person of fashion or fortune as a diamond in that of one who earns his bread by the sweat of his face. If the cost, the utility, or the necessity is to be the criterion, then the line must be drawn on many articles of furniture, clothing, and food. What shall be the delicacies of the table, the adornments of the person, and the character of the furnishings, must be left to the better judgment and discretion of each family, which is presumed to, and ordinarily does, act as a unit in such matters. Many families would have no use for terrapin, silks and satins, or Smyrna rugs, or costly jewelry, and in such cases neither husband nor wife would be liable for indebtedness incurred by the other therefor. But, if these are purchased for and used in the family, it is not perceived on what ground they may not be deemed a family charge. Under our statute, there is no occasion for inquiry as to the cost or necessity. Nor is there better reason to investigate the character or value of a button or stud worn, in determining whether it is a family expense, than that of a costly dress, an artistically trimmed bonnet, or a silk tile. The article may be unnecessary, or such as the family ought to have dispensed with, or of no actual utility; still, if purchased for and used in the family, the liability of the wife cannot be avoided. Dodd v. St. John, 22 Or. 250, 15 L. R. A. 717. If the diamond stud was worn by the defendant's husband, as is alleged, for personal use, as well as adornment, it is an expense such as is contemplated by the statute. Nor does such a holding involve necessary hardship. It is said in the petition that the McNairs are a family of large fortune, high social rank, and luxurious habits. If this be true, the jewelry may well be deemed appropriate to their situation in life, and a source of no considerable outlay in maintaining the family according to their station, and in harmony with their associations. The price of a diamond shirt stud will not in all cases be a family expense, but where procured for personal use, and actually used and worn by the husband, it becomes such. The same rule must be applied to the diamond and the pearl, to the rich and the poor.

ILLINOIS SUPREME COURT.

City of CHICAGO, Pff. in Err.,

v.

A. Montgomery WARD et al.

(109 Ill. 302.)

1. Leaving land unsubdivided upon a plat with an express dedication as public ground not to be occupied by buildings of any description, or marking it as a street and holding it out as open ground, no buildings, to purchasers, is equivalent to a dedication for public use, and creates a restriction against the erection of buildings thereon.

2. The submergence of lands dedicated as a public park with the express condition that no buildings shall be erected thereon, as the result of heavy storms, and the subsequent rec-

NOTE.—Effect of sudden submergence upon title to land.

The statement from Hale, De Jure Maris, which is quoted in the opinion, that "if a subject bath land adjoining the sea and the violence of the sea swallow it up, the subject will not lose his property if there are reasonable marks to continue the notice of it, or if its extent can be ascertained,"—has been generally recognized as the true rule in cases in which it was applicable.

The statement that "if the sea overflow my land for forty years and afterwards reflow again, I shall have my land and not the King," is also found in 2 Rolle, Abr. 168.

In Mulry v. Norton, 100 N. Y. 424, 58 Am. Rep. 206, it is said that it is undoubtedly true that the title of a landowner may be lost by submergence, but to effect that result the submergence must be followed by such a lapse of time as will preclude the identity of the property from being established upon its reliction. But ordinarily lands lost by submergence may be regained by reliction. Affirming Mulry v. Norton, 29 Hun. 600, which in turn affirmed Murphy v. Norton, 61 How. Pr. 197.

Though the surface of a part of an island is destroyed by the force of winds and waves, yet the owner does not lose the propriety of the remaining land covered by the water if it is regained by either natural or artificial means, and if another island is deposited on it the title is in the owner of the land previously thereon. Morris v. Brooke (Del.) 25 Alb. L. J. 90.

The sudden and perceptible loss of land by the action of the water of a river does not deprive the owner of the submerged land over which the water flows of his title. And if an island subsequently forms on the place where the land formerly was situated, it will belong to the former owner. St. Louis v. Rutz, 188 U. S. 228, 84 L. ed. 941; Rutz v. Seeger, 35 Fed. Rep. 188.

17 L. ed. 158, the court says that it will not decide what are the rights of lake-shore proprietors whose fronts are swept away by the currents, nor to what extent they still own the lands covered by water, except in the case of one who proves that he owned the land before the accretion took place.

Where after a railroad company had appropriated land along a river bank for its use, and a suit to recover the damages had been brought, the land caved into the river, it was held that as to so much of the land as was washed into the river no action could be maintained against the railroad to enforce a claim for its use, or to enjoin its use until compensation was made. Organ v. Memphis & L. R. R. Co. 51 Ark. 235.

If after the survey of swamp lands and before the issuance of a patent therefor to a private citizen, one boundary is cut away by a river so that the bed of the river is changed one quarter of a mile, the title of the patentee will not include the bed of the river, but will go only to high-water mark, and an island formed between the old and new beds will belong to the state. Heckman v. Swett, 99 Cal. 308.

The person who claims the title to the land under the water has the burden of showing that the land caved off suddenly, and also the extent to which the former boundary went. Wallace v. Driver, 61 Ark. 423, 81 L. R. A. 817.

In Missouri there appears to have been some departure from the rule as above stated. This appears to have been caused by the adoption of the rule applicable in case of boundaries as shown by the authorities cited in the next subdivision.

In Cooley v. Golden, 117 Mo. 23, 21 L. R. A. 800, it is said that the ownership of land in Missouri is subject to such changes as may be wrought by the natural action of the waters of navigable rivers upon it. So that if a river leaves its bed and makes a new one on the land of a private person, the bed immediately becomes subject to public use.

lamation by the city of such land, do not destroy the restrictions.

3. The vested right of owners abutting upon a public park, dedicated with the restriction that no buildings shall be erected upon it, fixed by the acts of dedication, the acceptance of the city, and the acquiescence of the public and abutting owners, cannot be changed by the legislature granting the city the right to convey such land for railroad purposes, as such action would be an unconstitutional impairment of such rights.
4. A restriction against the erection of buildings upon land dedicated as a park is not removed by the change of the use of the buildings abutting thereon from residence to business purposes.
5. A city acting as trustee of a public park bounded upon a lake by filling in submerged land adjacent thereto as a part of the park is estopped from claiming title to the same free from the park trust, and from restrictions thereof against the erection of buildings upon the park.

6. The owners of lots abutting on ground dedicated for a public park with restrictions against the erection of buildings thereon have a right to maintain a suit to enjoin the erection of buildings.
7. Consent of owners abutting upon a park dedicated under restrictions against the erection of buildings to the erection of one or more buildings upon such park will not estop them from bringing suit to enjoin the erection of other buildings.

(November 8, 1897).

In Naylor v. Cox, 114 Mo. 232, it is said that if a portion of a fractional section of land was washed away by a river, and the main channel of the river covered the place where it originally stood for any considerable length of time, and accretions afterwards grew from an island in the river until the land came within the former lines of the fractional section, the owner of the section would have no title to the accretions.

In Cox v. Arnold, 129 Mo. 337, it is said that when a riparian owner acquires his land, he acquires, as incident thereto, whatever may be added to it by gradual and imperceptible accretion, while at the same time he assumes the risk of losing it all by its being gradually washed away by the waters of the river, but his line always remains at the water's edge. The only way that plaintiff could have regained what land he lost by its being washed away and its situs submerged by the waters of the river was by gradual and imperceptible accretion beginning at his line at the water's edge. So that if a section of his land is washed away, and an island subsequently forms within what were formerly his boundary lines, he has no title to it.

But in another case it is said that if land after being washed away reforms gradually the owner of the upland may have title to the new formation by right of accretion. These were the facts in Minton v. Steele, 125 Mo. 181, and the court says whether the claim to the new land should properly rest upon the force of the original title, or be referred to the general law of accretion, we are not required to investigate.

Change of boundary.

In the above cases the question has been considered as between subject and sovereign, and the rule is that the sovereign gains no right to the subject's land by its being suddenly submerged by the waters if the former boundaries of the land can be ascertained. But where the question is as to a water-course forming a boundary between states or private persons a somewhat different rule has been established for the sake of convenience.

In the case of the Arctifluous Boundaries, 8 Ops. Atty. Gen. 175, it is said that in case of a river, the middle thread of which forms the boundary between two nations, the convenience of allowing it to retain its previous function, notwithstanding insensible changes in its channel by accretion or erosion, outweighs the inconvenience even to the injured party involved in a detriment, which happens gradually and inappreciably in the successive moments of its progression.

So, in Nebraska v. Iowa, 143 U. S. 380, 38 L. ed. 190, the court says that by reason of the character of the soil through which the Missouri river runs, and the swiftness of the river at times of high water, the washing causes an instantaneous fall of quite the length and breadth of the superstratum of soil into the river, so that it may in one sense of the term be said that the diminution of the banks is not gradual and imperceptible, but sudden and visible. And the court says that while the disappearance, by reason of this process, of a mass of bank may be sudden and obvious, there is no transfer of such a solid body of earth to the opposite shore, or anything like an instantaneous and visible creation of a bank on that shore. The only thing which distinguishes this river from other streams in the matter of accretion is in the rapidity of the change created by the velocity of the current; and this in the very nature of things works no change in the principle underlying the rule of law in respect thereto. The law of accretion continues, and that even in case of the boundary line of states.

And the principle of that case was followed in Bouvier v. Stricklett, 40 Neb. 732.

In Willey v. Lewis, 28 Ohio L. J. 104, it is said that if a running stream changes its channel by a gradual and progressive washing away of one of its banks the boundary follows the thread of the stream, although the change is caused by instantaneous and obvious dropping into the stream of quite large portions of the bank when such portions are not carried away in compact masses, but disintegrate and are borne away in small particles.

It will be seen from the reasoning in those cases that the question of the stream as a boundary between opposite owners, and not the question of the loss of the subject's land to the sovereign by sudden submergence, was involved. The two classes of cases are governed by distinct but well-defined rules, the only doubt being whether or not the rule in reference to gradual change applies in case the change is perceptible and covers considerable distance at one time; yet in the Missouri cases above cited, this rule, and not the correct one, appears to have been applied in cases between subject and sovereign.

The rule as to gradual change does not apply in case the river leaves its former channel and cuts a new one. That class of cases is not within the scope of this note, although attention is called to the fact that in Re Hull & S. B. Co., 5 Mees. & W. 327, Lord Abinger states that in case a river suddenly leaves its course and is transferred to another person's land the owner of the bed of the river does not lose his title to the soil.

So, if a river suddenly moves sideways so as to leave a strip of the bank which had been on one side, upon the other side of it, the title will not be changed, but the former owner will still have title to such strip. McKay v. Huggan, 24 N. S. 514.

So the ownership of land will not be changed by the sudden change of the course of a stream so as to leave a portion of the land of one riparian owner upon the other side of the channel. Sweatman v. Holbrook, 18 Ky. L. Rep. 370, and 372. H. P. P.

First Evangelical Church Trustees v. Walsh, 57 Ill. 868, 869, 11 Am. Rep. 21, and cases cited.

Carter, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

This was a bill for an injunction, filed in the superior court of Cook county, October 16, 1890, by A. Montgomery Ward and George R. Thorne, to enjoin the city of Chicago from erecting any buildings on what is known as "Lake Park," or "Lake Front Park." The bill alleges that they are the owners of the south 43 feet of lot 3, and all of lots 4 and 5, in block 15 in Ft. Dearborn addition to the city of Chicago, known as "Nos. 111-116 Michigan Avenue;" that valuable buildings are erected on said lots and occupied by them in their business of importers, manufacturers, and jobbers of general merchandise; that when said addition was platted an open space was reserved for public grounds east of Michigan avenue, and between Randolph and Madison streets, fronting on Lake Michigan, subject to the prohibition that the grounds should be kept free from buildings; that the lots owned by them are worth more on account of such vacant grounds than they would be otherwise; that they have an easement in such grounds; that it was the duty of the city to prevent encroachments on such grounds, but that it has permitted the erection of certain structures thereon, contrary to the vested rights of complainants, etc. And it prays for an injunction restraining the city from violating the terms of the dedication, and against the erection of buildings, etc., thereon. The Illinois Central Railroad Company and a number of other parties were made defendants. A temporary injunction was granted, and the city answered the bill, denying that it had committed the acts complained of, or intended to erect any structures. On May 6, 1893, the bill was amended. The amended bill alleges that that part of Lake Park south of Madison street has been for many years public grounds and park property, and the lots in Ft. Dearborn addition were sold with the understanding that all of Lake Park should be and remain clear of all buildings; that the city had suffered the Illinois Central Railroad Company and others to occupy portions of the park, and had suffered circuses, shows, etc., upon said premises; that it is using it as a dumping ground for garbage, rubbish, etc., and has constructed a scaffold and floor for that purpose, the filth and rubbish to be carried away by the railroad company, causing a great public nuisance; that the American Express Company has built a shed thereon; that there are seven or more railroad tracks upon it, upon which cars are permitted to stand; that the city has issued a permit to the Forepaugh shows to occupy part of the same. And it prays for a temporary injunction, and for a mandatory injunction, to remove all buildings, sheds, cars, tracks, and material of every kind from the park. The city answered the amended bill, denying the alleged restrictions on the use of the park; alleging that the character of the buildings in Ft. Dearborn addition, and purposes for which they were used, has been entirely changed, for more than twenty-five years, from residence to business purposes, and that the use for which the public grounds were conveyed has long since ceased to attach thereto; denying that the property of complainants is enhanced in value by reason of its situation relatively to the park, and that the owners have any easement of light, air, or view over the same; denying that the grounds were dedicated for any specific public purpose; and alleging ownership by the city in fee simple absolute. On June 8, 1896, complainants again amended their bill, with the stipulation that the answer of the city should stand as the answer to such secondly amended bill. This amendment sets out the history of the platting and dedication of the two additions to the city of Chicago, of which Lake Park is a part, at length, and alleges that the city accepted the dedication by a resolution of April 29, 1844, which resolution ordered what is now called "Lake Park" to be inclosed as a public park, at the expense of the subscribers of such inclosure; that the city council, by ordinance of August 10, 1847, designated the public ground so fenced in as "Lake Park;" that the abutting property owners on Michigan avenue had, prior thereto, erected a fence at their own expense, around said park, and ornamented the same, etc. It recites § 64 of the act of February 18, 1861, in reference to the charter of the city of Chicago, and refers to the act of 1863 on the same subject, and alleges that the construction of buildings on Lake park, and its occupancy by railroad tracks, or for other private purposes, and the licensing of the same for circus purposes, etc., and the employment of the same as a dumping ground for filth, etc., will constitute a public nuisance and will divert the park from the purposes for which it was dedicated, and will constitute a private nuisance, and inflict irreparable damages on the property of complainants, special to the same, and distinct from that suffered by the public at large. The final decree that was entered by the court recites that all the material allegations in the various bills and amendments are true. It decrees that the injunction of May 25, 1890, be made perpetual; that the Illinois Central Railroad Company and the city and its officers desist and refrain from occupying any buildings or structures, except such as described in the ordinance of October 21, 1895, upon the tract of land known as "Lake Park;" that they refrain from placing or causing to be placed thereon anything, except for park purposes, and from using, or permitting the use of, any portion thereof for railroad tracks, or such circuses or exhibitions to which the public will not be admitted free; that nothing in the decree shall be held to impair or diminish the rights, etc., of the Illinois Central Railroad Company under the ordinance of October 21, 1895; that the Art Institute, and all necessary improvements thereon, so long as it shall be used in accordance with the terms of the ordinance authorizing its construction, shall be excluded from the operation of the decree, and likewise the temporary postoffice building, until a new, permanent postoffice shall be completed and occupied, and also, for a period of three months, the armory buildings. To reverse this decree, the city of Chicago alone has sued out a writ of error from this court.

The evidence showed that the abutting property owners expended considerable sums of money, from time to time, as also did the city of Chicago, in protecting said park from the ravages of, Lake Michigan, and in fencing and beautifying the grounds. It was declared by the government plat of the Ft. Dearborn addition that "the public ground between Randolph and Madison streets, and fronting upon Lake Michigan, is not to be occupied with buildings of any description." By a resolution adopted April 29, 1844, the city declared that all that part of Michigan avenue lying east of a line 90 feet east of the east line of the tier of lots in § 15, fronting said avenue on the west, shall be inclosed as a public park; and the same resolution declared, in substance, that the public ground in the Ft. Dearborn addition should be inclosed as a public park, at the expense of subscribers to such inclosure. And in 1847, by an ordinance of the city, it was ordained: "The public ground east of the fence erected on the east side of Michigan avenue from the north side of Randolph street to the south side of lot 8 in block 21, fractional section 15, addition to Chicago [which was coincident with the south line of Park row], shall hereafter be known and designated as Lake Park." The city council passed another ordinance to the same effect, August 25, 1851, which declared that the public ground on the east of Michigan avenue from the north line of Randolph street to the south line of Park row should be designated as "Lake Park." Another ordinance to the same effect was passed by the city council in 1856; and in the ordinance granting a right of way to the Illinois Central Railroad Company passed June 14, 1852, it was provided that said company should not, in any manner or for any purpose, occupy or intrude upon the open ground known as "Lake Park," belonging to the city of Chicago, lying between Michigan avenue and the western or inner line before mentioned, which was a line not less than 400 feet east of the west line of Michigan avenue, and parallel thereto. And similar inhibitions were imposed in subsequent ordinances. The existence of this park was recognized by legislation of that state, by the acts passed in 1861 and 1863, in which the act incorporating the city of Chicago and the several amendments thereto were reduced to a single act, and in which, in § 64, were the following provisions: "No encroachments shall be made upon the land or water west of the line mentioned in the 2d section of an ordinance concerning the Illinois Central Railroad (which line is not less than 400 feet east from the west side of Michigan avenue, and parallel thereto) by any railroad company, nor shall any cars, locomotives, engines, machines, or other things belonging to any railroad or transportation company be permitted to occupy the same, nor shall any cars or machinery be left standing upon said track fronting any part of Michigan avenue, nor shall the city council ever allow any encroachments west of the line above described. Any person being the owner of or being interested in any lot, or part of a lot, fronting on Michigan avenue, shall have the right to enjoin said company, and all other persons and corporations, from any violation of the provisions of this section, or of said ordinance, and by bill or petition in chancery, in his or their own name or otherwise, enforce the provisions of said ordinance and of this section, and recover such damages for any such encroachment or violation as the court shall deem just. The state of Illinois, by its canal commissioners, having declared that the public grounds east of said lots should forever remain open and vacant, neither the common council of the city of Chicago, nor any other authority, shall ever have the power to permit encroachments thereon, without the assent of all the persons owning lots or land on said street or avenue."

The main question involved in this litigation is, Has the city of Chicago a right to erect, or permit to be erected, any buildings on the track of land known as "Lake Park?" Lake park is a tract of land extending from Randolph street, on the north, to Park row, on the south, and from the west line of Michigan avenue, on the west, a distance of 400 feet, to the west line of the right of way of the Illinois Central Railroad Company. Leaving out Michigan avenue, which has a width of 90 feet, the park would be 310 feet wide, and over a mile long. In order properly to determine this question, it will be necessary to advert to the history of Lake Park. In 1836 the commissioners of the Illinois & Michigan Canal, under the authority conferred upon them by the general assembly of the state, caused fractional section 15, lying along the shore of Lake Michigan, and adjoining or cornering with the original town of Chicago, to be subdivided into lots, blocks, and streets; and a plat thereof was made, acknowledged, and recorded on July 20, 1836. This subdivision consists of two tiers of blocks, of 11 blocks each, bounded on the west by State street, on the north by the center line of Madison street, and on the south by the center line of twelfth street. The lots in the east half of the eastern tier of blocks all fronted to the east, and there was an open space between such east line and the lake, excepting at the southwest corner, in which block 28 was laid off, beginning 120 feet east of the east line of the eastern tier of blocks, and running thence east 500 feet, of a uniform depth, towards the north, of 200 feet, leaving a small space, the width of which was not marked on the map,—about 80 feet,—between the easternmost lot of block 23 and the lake. The street north of this block 23 is now known as "Park Row." The distance from the eastern tier of blocks to the lake shore was therefore about 700 feet at Park row. The distance at the north line of the section from the lake shore to the east line of the eastern tier of blocks was not marked on the plat, but appears to have been about 500 feet. All the space north of block 23 and east of the eastern tier of blocks to the lake was left unsubdivided and vacant, except that the words "Michigan Avenue" appear on the same, next to the line of subdivided blocks. J. Y. Scammon testified that he measured the width of the ground east of Michigan avenue in 1836, when the canal commissioners made their subdivisions, and it was then about 700 feet wide at the south end, and between 500 and 600 feet at the north end, and that the ground was a little wider at some places than others. Fernando Jones testified that he was employed in the office of the canal commissioners in 1836; that it was stated by and on behalf of the commissioners, to all persons purchasing lots in the subdivision, as an inducement to such purchases, that there would be no buildings to obstruct the view of the lake, and that the commissioners used a sketch to sell from, and to point out the position of lots to purchasers, and on the sketch was marked: "Open ground. No building;" that the land fronting on Michigan avenue, as well as that fronting on Wabash avenue, the next street west, sold at a higher price on account of the eastern exposure of the lake. The land north of section 15, running to the Chicago river, being the southwest fractional quarter of section 10, was used by the United States as the military post of Ft. Dearborn, as early as 1804. Under authority from the secretary of war, this fractional quarter was subdivided into blocks, lots, streets, and public grounds, and called "Ft. Dearborn Addition," and a plat of the addition was acknowledged and recorded on June 7, 1839. Michigan avenue was continued north in this plat almost up to the river, but its width is not marked on the plat. The ground between Michigan avenue and the lake was also laid off into blocks and lots from the river down to Randolph street, but from the north line of that street to the south line of the section (being the center of Madison street) the space between the west line of Michigan avenue and the lake was left vacant and unsubdivided, as was also the east half of the block just south of Randolph street, between Wabash avenue on the west, and Michigan avenue on the east; and on this blank space on the plat was written: "Public ground. Forever to remain vacant of buildings." The certificate of the Secretary of War, written on the margin of the plat, contains these words: "The public ground between Randolph and Madison streets, and fronting upon Lake Michigan, is not to be occupied with buildings of any description." The plat shows that the southernmost lot of block 11, which lies between Michigan avenue and the lake, and on the north side of Randolph street, and is thus the northern boundary of the unsubdivided space, had a frontage of 73 feet on Randolph street. There are no figures at the south line of the addition to indicate the distance between the west line of Michigan avenue and the lake, but measuring on the plat according to its scale, it was 200 feet. Michigan avenue is 90 feet wide.

It will thus be seen that the land lying east of the west line of Michigan avenue, from Randolph street on the north, to Park row on the south, was by its original owners left unsubdivided; that that portion in fractional section 10 was expressly dedicated as "public ground," "not to be occupied with buildings of any description," and that that portion in fractional section 15 was marked near one edge "Michigan Avenue," and was held out to purchasers as: "Open ground. No buildings." That this was equivalent to a dedication for such use and purpose has been repeatedly announced by this court. Godfrey v. Allon, 12 Ill. 29, 52 Am. Dec. 476; Morey v. Taylor, 19 Ill. 634; Smith v. Flora, 64 Ill. 93; Maywood Co. v. Maywood, 118 Ill. 61. And, where nothing appears to indicate for what particular use a grant or donation of land is made to the public, parol evidence is admissible to show the object to which it was to be devoted. Princeton v. Aiken, 77 Ill. 325. That the city of Chicago accepted the ground thus dedicated is undisputed. The statute provides that such dedicated lands shall be held in trust to and for the uses and purposes expressed or intended; and even in a common-law dedication, which leaves the fee on the original owner, it is charged with the same rights and interests in the public which it would have if the fee were in the municipality. Chicago, R. I. & P. R. Co. v. Joliet, 79 Ill. 25. That the land was so dedicated and accepted subject to the restrictions imposed, of being forever unoccupied by buildings, and that this restriction extended to and included all the land between the west line of Michigan avenue and the shore of the lake, as it was when these lands were platted, we entertain no doubt. But it is contended by plaintiff in error that only such land as existed between Michigan avenue and the shore of the lake as it was in 1852, when the encroachments of the lake on the land were stopped by the building of breakwaters, etc., was subject to such restrictions; that, the remainder having been carried away by the waters of Lake Michigan, the boundaries of the public land were restricted to the shore of the lake; and that all the made or reclaimed land between the shore line of 1852 and the west line of the Illinois Central Railroad Company's right of way is free from such restrictions. A consideration of this question will necessitate a further retrospect into the history of Lake park.

Referring again to the testimony of J. Y. Scammon, we find that the building of the piers of the Chicago river by the government eastward into Lake Michigan had the effect of throwing a strong current of water against the shore of section 10, and that when the piers were still further extended the current was thrown further south, against the shore of section 15; that this current would gradually undermine the bank, and then a storm would come, and the bank would fall, sometimes 5, 10, and 30 feet in width at a time; that sometimes there would be washed away 100 feet in a single storm, and then the wind would change, and there would be a deposit of sand again; that in 1835 there were 200 or 300 feet between Michigan avenue and the shore of Randolph street, but two thirds had been washed away before the platting of Ft. Dearborn addition in 1839. Fernando Jones testified that prior to 1839 the waves cut away mostly between Randolph and Madison streets, and what was cut away there was deposited more or less south of Madison street, but after 1839 the big storms that came would wash away the banks as far down as Park row; that the "shore went off in chunks" during the storms; that sometimes after a storm there would be some accretions. The testimony of R. B. Mason shows that in 1852 the shore of Lake Michigan was distant from the west line of Michigan avenue at Park row a little over 400 feet, and thence the trend of the shore was to the west, till it was only 90 feet at Monroe street, which is the street next south after Madison; that it was the same width at Madison street, and gradually receding again to the east, it was 112½ feet at Washington street, the next street north, and the same width at Randolph street, the next street north, Michigan avenue being 90 feet wide. It will thus be seen that from the north line, at Randolph street, with a width of 22½ feet, the park extended down to about Madison street, a distance of two blocks, where the waters of Lake Michigan lapped the east side of Michigan avenue, and then the park recommenced at about Monroe street, and gradually widened out to 810 feet at Park row. In 1852 the Illinois Central Railroad Company, by an ordinance of the city of Chicago, was granted the right of way, of the width of 300 feet, from the southern boundary of the public ground near Twelfth street to the northern line of Randolph street; the inner or west line of the ground to be used by the company to be not less than 400 feet east from the west line of Michigan avenue. It was also required by the ordinance to erect, and forever after to maintain, a continuous wall or structure of stone masonry, of regular and slightly appearance, and not to exceed in height the general level of Michigan avenue opposite thereto, from the north side of Randolph street to the southern boundary of Lake park, at a distance of not more than 300 feet east from the above-mentioned west or inner line, which structure was to be of sufficient strength and magnitude to protect the entire front from further damage or injury from the action of the waters of Lake Michigan. It was further provided that the company should not in any manner, nor for any purpose whatever, occupy, use, or intrude upon the open ground known as "Lake Park," belonging to the city, and that it should erect no buildings between the north line of Randolph street and the south line of Lake park, nor place upon any part of their works between these points any obstructions to the view of the lake from the shore, and that it should make and keep open through its works such culverts or ways as would afford room for the uninterrupted flow of water from the open lake to the space inside of the inner or west line above mentioned. In pursuance of the rights thereby granted, the railroad company placed piling in the waters of the lake from Twelfth street northward, and built its tracks thereon, and built a breakwater east of its roadway. The water space between the shore and the right of way was gradually filled up by the citizens, although at the time of the great fire of 1871 there was still a basin there, used for rowboats and sailboats. After the fire the counsel passed an ordinance permitting the dumping of débris resulting from the fire into this space, and the railroad having filled it under its tracks, soon there was no more water left west of the east line of its right of way. That the city made ineffectual efforts to stay the destroying power of the waters of Lake Michigan prior to the building of the railroad breakwater is not disputed. As we have seen before, the width of the open space at Park row in 1836, when it was dedicated, was about 700 feet, and at Madison street about 500 feet. The width of Lake park, including Michigan avenue, is 400 feet. There was therefore in 1836 more than enough ground lying along the lake shore between these points for this park. From Madison street to the north line of the park, when this space was dedicated, in 1839 (three years later), there was an open space between the shore and the east line of blocks of only 200 feet at Madison street, narrowing down to 163 feet at Randolph street, thus lacking from 287 feet to 200 feet of being 400 feet wide.

Did the city lose its title and right to the portions of this park submerged by the waters of the lake after its dedication, or did its subsequent reclamation restore the city to its rights? Did the temporary submergence of such portions destroy the restrictions imposed by the dedication, so that the reclaimed portion would not be subject to the same? The destruction of the shore line was not gradual and imperceptible, but was sudden, and plainly discernible after every storm, and the city made unavailing efforts to protect the shore from this destruction. In a conveyance calling for a lake as a line, the line at which the water usually stands when free from disturbing causes is the boundary of the land. Seaman v. Smith, 24 Ill. 521; Trustees of Schools v. Schroll, 120 Ill. 509, 60 Am. Rep. 575; Fuller v. Shedd, 161 Ill. 462, 33 L. R. A. 146; People v. Kirk, 162 Ill. 138. In Harg. Law Tracts (Sir Matthew Hale, De Jure Maris) 36, 37, it is said: "If a subject hath land adjoining the sea, and the violence of the sea swallow it up, but so that yet there be reasonable marks to continue the notice of it, or though the marks be defaced, yet, if by situation and extent of quantity, and bounding upon the firm land, the same can be known, though the sea leave this land again, or it be by art or industry regained, the subject does not lose his property; and accordingly it was held by Cooke and Foster, though the inundation continued forty years. . . . But, if it be freely left again by the reflux and recess of the sea, the owner may have his land as before, if he can make it out where and what it was; for he cannot lose his propriety of the soil, though it be for a time become part of the sea, and within the admiral jurisdiction while it so continues." In Morris v. Brooks, an unreported case arising in 1815 in Delaware [25 Alb. L. J. 91], quoted in Mulry v. Norton, 100 N. Y. 426, 53 Am. Rep. 206, Judge Wilson said: "Though the surface of the lower part of that island [Little Tinicum] was destroyed by the force of the winds and waves, and it was consequently overflowed by the water of the river, yet the owner did not lose the propriety of the remaining soil covered by the water; if it was regained either by natural or artificial means, it continued to belong to the original proprietor. He might embank it and thereby again exclude the waters if circumstances permitted." And in Mulry v. Norton, 100 N. Y. 426, 53 Am. Rep. 206, it is said: "When portions of the main land have been gradually encroached upon by the ocean so that navigable channels have been extended thereover, the people, by virtue of their sovereignty over public highways, undoubtedly succeed to the control of such channels and the ownership of the land under them in case of its permanent acquisition by the sea. It is equally true, however, that when the water disappears from the land, either by its gradual retirement therefrom or the elevation of the land by avulsion or accretion, or even the exclusion of the water by artificial means, its proprietorship returns to the original riparian owners. . . . Neither does the lapse of time during which the submergence continues bar the right of such owner to enter upon the land reclaimed, and assert his proprietorship." Angell, Tide Waters, 77-80. "Where considerable quantities of soil are, by a sudden action of the water, taken from the land of one, this is called 'avulsion'; but the ownership is not lost, though the surface earth is thus transported elsewhere, and it may be reclaimed, and the ownership reasserted." Angell, Watercourses, § 60; 3 Washb. Real Prop. 453; Gale v. Kinzie, 80 Ill. 132.

Under the authorities, and according to all reasonable deductions from legal principles, we must hold that the title to these lands submerged by the action of Lake Michigan was not lost, and that by their subsequent reclamation the city has completely reasserted its title thereto, as such title stood at the time of the dedication of the respective plats thereof. The trust impressed upon them was that they should forever remain free from buildings, and it cannot be said that while they were submerged they were subject to be built upon. We do not see that the submergence and subsequent reclamation altered or destroyed the trust upon and for which they were held. As the city had, as we have seen, the fee in this park, impressed with the trust declared by the dedicators, the legislation of 1861 and 1863 added nothing to its trust, and can only be looked upon as confirmatory of the same. Section 64 of the act of 1861 identical with § 48 of the act of 1863 (both acts being acts relative to the charter of the city of Chicago), provided that no encroachments should be made upon the land or water west of the railroad right of way by any railroad company, nor allowed thereon by the city council; that any property owner on Michigan avenue should have the right to enjoin any such attempted encroachments, and recover damages therefor; and it recited that "the state of Illinois, by its canal commissioners, having declared that the public grounds east of said lots should forever remain open and vacant, neither the common council of the city of Chicago, nor any other authority, shall ever have the power to permit encroachments thereon, without the assent of all the persons owning lots or land on said street or avenue." No new trust was created by these statutes. They merely ordained as law what was already the law in reference to Lake park. A point is made by counsel for plaintiff in error on the use of the word "encroachment;" it being contended that buildings would not be an encroachment, as that word is defined by Webster. Wood, Nuisance, 2d ed. § 77, says: "A purpresture is any encroachment upon real property, or rights and easements incident thereto, belonging to the public, by an inclosure or erection thereon, which, if made upon the property of an individual, would be a trespass." In 1869 the legislature passed the act known as the "Lake Front Act." By § 1 of this act the general assembly purported to grant to the city of Chicago, in fee, with full power and authority to sell and convey in such manner and upon such terms as the council might by ordinance provide, all right, title, and interest of the state of Illinois in and to so much of fractional § 15 as is situated east of Michigan avenue, and north of Park row, and south of the south line of Monroe street, and west of the railroad right of way (being a strip 400 feet in width, including said avenue, along the shore of Lake Michigan, and partially submerged by the waters of the lake); reserving, however, the 90 foot avenue from the right to sell. By § 4 all right and title of the state of Illinois in and to the lands, submerged, or otherwise lying north of the south line of Monroe street, and south of the south line of Randolph street, and between the east line of Michigan avenue and the railroad right of way, were granted in fee to the Illinois Central Railroad Company, the Chicago, Burlington, & Quincy Railroad Company, and the Michigan Central Railroad Company, for the erection thereon of a passenger depot, and for other railroad business. Section 5 required these railroad companies, in consideration of this grant, to pay the city of Chicago $800,000, to be paid in quarterly installments. By section 6 the city council was authorized to quitclaim and release to said companies all the city's claim and interest in this tract which it might have by virtue of any expenditures and improvements thereon or otherwise; and, in case it neglected or refused to do so within four months after the passage of the act, then the companies should be discharged from paying the unpaid balance to the city. By §§ 2 and 5, all these moneys arising from the sale of Lake park were to be placed in a park fund of the city of Chicago, to be equitably distributed between the three divisions of the city. Section 8 confirmed to the Illinois Central Railroad Company certain rights to the lands east of Lake park covered by its railroad tracks, and granted to it in fee all the right and title of the state of Illinois in and to the submerged lands constituting the bed of Lake Michigan, and lying east of its tracks and breakwater, for the distance of 1 mile, and between the south line of the south pier extended eastwardly and a line extended eastward from the south line of lot 21, south of and near its roundhouse and machine shops, on the payment of the same percentage of the gross receipts from its use as it was bound to pay to the state, by its charter, on its gross receipts, which tract of submerged land so granted exceeded 1,000 acres. This act was passed, over the governor's veto, April 16, 1869. About July 1, 1869, the three railroad companies tendered to Walter Kimball, then city controller, the first instalment, of $200,000, which he refused to accept in his official capacity, but gave his individual receipt therefor, and reported the fact to the city council. The matter was referred to the judiciary committee, which on December 20, 1869, reported back to the council, reciting the several dedications above described, together with the facts regarding the washing away of the shore, and the attempts made to prevent the same, and the expenditure of money therefor, and that the city had been for years engaged in reclaiming that part of the land so dedicated, and had succeeded in reclaiming all that portion north of Monroe street; that, so far as the citizens of Chicago and the owners of the property fronting said public grounds are concerned, the city stands in the position of a trustee; that it would be a most flagrant and unjustifiable breach of trust upon the part of the city to sell the property, or in any manner to consent that this land shall be appropriated to other than public uses,—and recommended the passage of a resolution declaring that the city will not receive any money from the railroad companies under the said act of the general assembly until forced to do so by the courts. The resolution was subsequently passed, and the money was afterwards returned to the railroad companies, at their request.

It is plain that the city repudiated the privilege granted it by the legislature, and never accepted the act as binding on it. It may be said, in passing, that the Supreme Court of the United States, in Illinois C. R. Co. v. Illinois, 146 U. S. 387, 36 L. ed. 1018, denied the right of the legislature to make this extensive grant of the submerged lands in the harbor of Chicago, and held the grant to the railroad company to be ineffective, with certain exceptions. As we have already seen, all the rights in regard to Lake park had long previously been fixed by the acts of dedication by the original owners, the acceptance of the city, and the acquiescence and acts of the public and abutting property owners. It was beyond the power of the legislature to change the legal result of these acts, as it would be an impairment of vested rights, which are protected by the Constitution. In Jacksonville v. Jacksonville R. Co. 67 Ill. 540, 543, this court said: "A dedication must always be construed with reference to the object with which it was made.

... The power of the legislature to repeal the charters of municipal corporations cannot be extended to the right to divert property given to the public for one use to a wholly different and inconsistent use. The power cannot exist to divert property from the purpose for which it was donated. This plat was a solemn dedication of the ground to the corporation, to be held in trust for the use of the public. The donation was made for a certain specific and defined purpose. . . . It must be preserved, or the land must revert to the original proprietors." The court cite, as fully sustaining the view it has taken, Cincinnati v. White, 31 U. S. 6 Pet. 431, 8 L. ed. 452; Watertown v. Cowen, 4 Paige, 510, 27 Am. Dec. 80; Le Clercq v. Gallipolis, 7 Ohio, pt. 1, p. 217, 28 Am. Dec. 641; Carter v. Chicago, 57 Ill. 283; Price v. Thompson, 48 Mo. 361; Warren v. Lyons City, 22 Iowa, 351. In Princeville v. Auten, 77 Ill. 325, it is said: "Had this intention [that a certain square should forever remain an open space] been expressed on the plat, or even in the contemporaneous certificates it is clear, on principle and authority, the village trustees could not lawfully appropriate it to any other public use. It would have been an abuse of the trust reposed in them, that the courts would not hesitate to control, that the property might be preserved for the uses intended by the donors." It is only where the dedication of the property as public ground is an unrestricted dedication to public use that the city or legislature may designate the uses to which it shall be put. Chicago, R. I. & P. R. Co. v. Joliet, 79 Ill. 25. As the legislature was powerless to take away any vested rights that abutting property holders had in Lake park, it is unnecessary to discuss the effect of the repeal of the act of 1869 by the legislature in 1873. The same authorities and course of reasoning also negative the proposition put forth by plaintiff in error, that where the restrictions placed on the use of real property have become useless by the change of the character of the surrounding property and neighborhood, they may be disregarded. It is assumed by plaintiff in error that these open spaces were dedicated for a park, to remain free from buildings, because Michigan avenue was then a residence street, and that because of the gradual disappearance of residences from the upper end of this street, and their replacement by business houses, therefore the open space, clear of buildings, was not needed any more. That this reasoning is fallacious need hardly be demonstrated. It is a matter of common knowledge that nearly all of our larger cities have open squares in the business portions of the city, and that these open squares are deemed and considered of great advantage, not only to the public generally, but especially to the abutting property owners. In this case it is a vested right attaching to the abutting property by virtue of the original dedications. The cases cited in support of the position of plaintiff in error are not applicable to the facts of this case. They were cases relating to the restrictive covenants in deeds, where the original owner had devised a scheme for improving the neighborhood by controlling the erection of buildings in a particular way. They have no relevancy to the case of an open park. No change in the use of the buildings abutting on a park could make the park any less a park, or deprive the abutting owners of their vested rights.

But there is a strip of land within said park, as claimed by complainants, lying along fractional section 10, which cannot be said to have been reclaimed by the city after having been submerged by the lake after its dedication, in 1839. Neither was this strip formed by the slow and imperceptible process of accretion, but it is made or filled land, and is 237 feet wide at the north line of Randolph street, and about 200 feet wide at the center of Madison street, as stated above. And the question remains whether or not this strip is held by the city subject to the restrictions placed upon that part of Ft. Dearborn addition adjoining it. If this strip had been formed by gradual accretion caused by the action of the waters, it would have become a part of the shore lands. In Godfrey v. Alton, 12 Ill. 29, 52 Am. Dec. 476, this court held that "all accretions to a public landing must necessarily attach to and form a part of it, otherwise we should have the novel spectacle, of a public landing separated from the water." In Lombard v. Kinzie, 73 Ill. 446, the question arose whether the widow of a riparian owner was entitled to dower in the accretions to land which had accreted after the husband had parted with the land, and it was there held that she was entitled to dower in such accretions; that when formed such accretions become subject, as an incident to the fee, to the same conditions, rights, and burdens as the principal to which it is an incident. In Cobb v. Lavalle, 89 Ill. 331, 31 Am. Rep. 91, it was held that the lessee of a property fronting upon a river is entitled to hold accretions as a part and parcel of the property leased. In Chicago Dock & Canal Co. v. Kinzie, 93 Ill. 415, the lot in question was bounded on the east by Lake Michigan, and this court said (p. 429): "To ascertain its eastern boundary, it would be necessary to ascertain where was the line between the land and the lake; and, since the accretions became a part of the land to which they were attached, it would necessarily follow that that line would follow the receding lake to the east. The accretions do not pass as appurtenant to water lot 36, but as a part of that lot." But the strip in question is filled land, and not formed by accretions. It is admitted that the title to this strip is also in the city, but such admission does not cover the question whether the city owns it in trust, as public ground, or as a part of said public park, or holds absolute title thereto in its own right, with the right to use or dispose of the property as it may see proper. Counsel for plaintiff in error says in his argument that it does not appear from the record how the city acquired title to the submerged lands north of Monroe street, which include this strip, but claims that, between the city and the state, that question has been adjudicated. Illinois C. R. Co. v. Illinois, 146 U. S. 387, 36 L. ed. 1018. The question here, however, is one between these abutting property owners and the city; and if the strip last mentioned is subject to the same trust as the remainder of said park, or that part of it which became submerged after its dedication, and was thereafter reclaimed, then, so far as this case is concerned, it must be regarded as a part of said public park, and the right of the city to authorize the construction of buildings upon it must be denied, if such right is denied as to the rest of the park, whatever the rights of the state might appear to be in a case where that question might be at issue. These open lands fronting on Lake

Michigan, as we have seen, had been dedicated as public ground, to be kept free from buildings; and both the city and the state, by their respective legislative bodies, had declared them to be a public park, to be kept open and vacant, and free from encroachments. These lands declared to be a public park extended to the waters of Lake Michigan, and the title thereto carried with it riparian rights incident to its location upon the banks of the lake. These riparian rights were property rights which the city of Chicago held in trust in the same manner that it held title to these public grounds; and whether, under any circumstances, it could, by obtaining title to the lands under the shoal waters adjacent to the park, and by filling in, destroy such riparian rights, and hold the title to such filled lands free from such trust, it is not necessary here to decide, for we are satisfied from the evidence in the case showing the acts and declarations of the city authorities in dealing with these lands that the abutting property owners had the right to assume, and rest in the belief, that the city was not acting in antagonism to its trust, and with the purpose of destroying such riparian rights which attached to the public grounds, and of thereby acquiring an independent title to itself, but was, as such trustee, maintaining and preserving the property rights which it held in trust, and was improving said park, and extending its boundaries into shallow waters of the lake. The city was a trustee, and, besides, it had the power, by its charter, to lay out, establish, open, extend, and improve parks and public grounds; and so far as it made any addition, if it did make any, to Lake park, by filling in said strip of submerged lands, it must, upon the record before us, be presumed that it was acting under its charter powers, in the preservation of the trust imposed upon it by the dedication, and its acceptance thereof, of these public grounds, and we are of the opinion that the city is estopped from claiming title to the same free from such trust. We have been referred to Ruge v. Apalachicola Oyster Canning & F. Co. 25 Fla. 656, and other cases, as announcing a different doctrine. But the facts in those cases were different from those disclosed by this record, and we cannot see that the reasoning employed, if adopted, would, on a record of this character, lead to a different conclusion.

The next point of plaintiff in error is that defendants in error have no standing in a court of equity to obtain the relief sought by their bill. In Jacksonville v. Jacksonville R. Co. 67 Ill. 540, we said: "A court of equity has the right to enforce the execution of the plainly declared trust, either upon the application of the owners of lots abutting upon the square, or upon the application of the city, the trustee."

The square is valuable property, intended for the use of the public, and appurtenant to the estates of the abutting lotowners." See also cases cited above, in connection with that case. In Princeton v. Auten, 77 Ill. 825, the village trustees were enjoined from putting a town hall on the public square, at the suit of Auten and others, and this court affirmed the decree. In Earl v. Chicago, 136 Ill. 277, where there was a cross petition for an injunction, the court said, "Where there is a special trust in favor of an adjoining property holder, or a special injury, a bill or suit may be maintained by an individual in respect to a public street or highway;" and the decree granting the injunction was affirmed. In Maywood Co. v. Maywood, 118 Ill. 61, it was contended that there was a misjoinder of complainants. The court said: "Small and Hubbard, as residents of the village, have a common interest with each other, and with the village itself, in preventing any obstruction to the use of the public square for the purposes of a park. . . . They are therefore properly joined with the village, as complainants." In United States v. Illinois C. R. Co. 154 U. S. 225, 38 L. ed. 971, the Supreme Court of the United States, in speaking of that part of Lake park dedicated by the Secretary of War, said: "The only parties interested in the public use for which the ground was dedicated are the owners of lots abutting on the ground dedicated, and the public in general. The owners of the abutting lots may be presumed to have purchased in part consideration of the enhanced value of the property from the dedication, and it may be conceded they have a right to invoke, through the proper public authorities, the protection of the property in the use for which it was dedicated." Defendants in error are the owners of the south 43 feet of lot 8, and all of lots 4 and 5, in block 15 of Ft. Dearborn addition, and have a frontage on Lake park of 189 feet. They are clearly abutting owners, and as such have a right to maintain this action. Nor does it make any difference that Lake park was dedicated by two different owners at different times. The canal commissioners dedicated that part in fractional section 15 first, and, in selling the abutting lots, held out to purchasers the fact that such space should be clear of buildings, as an inducement. The Secretary of War, who dedicated the remainder of the park in fractional section 10 three years later, it is evident, did this in order to make one continuous open space, and expressly certified that such space should remain clear from buildings; thus following and continuing the practice of the canal commissioners. Besides, this open space has always been treated by the city and the public as one park.

But it is further urged against the contentions of defendants in error that they are estopped by consenting to repeated violations of the injunction, and of their rights in the park, and that, by discriminating in favor of certain violators, they have waived their right to restrain others committing similar violations. The proceedings and decrees in quite a number of suits were introduced in evidence, showing that since the lake front act of 1869 there has been a great deal of litigation in the state and Federal courts over the use of the park. The first was a suit in the Federal court to prevent the railroads from taking possession of that part of the park north of Madison street, under the act of 1869, instituted by one Starkweather against the Illinois Central Railroad Company, and afterwards consolidated with a similar suit by the United States against the same company, brought on behalf of the abutting property owners in fractional section 15.

by the United States district attorney, in which the injunction, as prayed for, was granted in both cases. In the summer of 1871 the first structure of any kind was built upon Lake park, the ground between Randolph and Madison streets having been fenced in and used as a ball ground; and again, between 1877 and 1884, the same ground was fenced up and used by the Chicago Baseball Club. But in the latter year a bill was filed in the Federal court, on behalf of the abutting property owners of Ft. Dearborn addition, by the United States, against the club of that city, to enjoin the maintenance of fences, buildings, etc., and compel their removal. The injunction was granted against the club and the city, absolutely prohibiting the maintenance of any building or structure on that part of the park described in the bill, and the baseball club removed their structures, in compliance with the order. In 1882 the property owners procured a suit to be started in the United States circuit court to enjoin the Baltimore & Ohio Railroad Company from laying tracks in Lake park, which is still pending. In March, 1883, the property owners procured one Stafford to file a bill in the circuit court of Cook county against the city, the Trades and Labor Assembly, and a number of other corporations, railroad companies, etc., to enjoin them from occupying and encumbering with buildings or otherwise any part of Lake park, and the injunction was granted, enjoining the erection of any building on fractional section 15; and in May, 1883, another injunction writ was issued against the city to the same effect. In 1883 a suit was begun in the state court by the attorney general against the Illinois Central Railroad Company and the city of Chicago, which was afterwards removed to the Federal court, to determine the title and rights of the several parties to the lands lying east of Michigan avenue, to which bill the city of Chicago filed a cross bill; and in which suit a decree was entered September 24, 1888, finding, among other things, that the city had title in fee to Lake park, which decree was afterwards (December 5, 1892) affirmed by the Supreme Court of the United States, 83 Fed. Rep. 730, 146 U. S. 387, 36 L. ed. 1018. The city has also at various times assumed the right to grant permission to erect structures on Lake park, or to use the same for various purposes. The first was April 23, 1873, when it authorized the erection of what was termed the "Exposition Building" between Monroe and Van Buren streets, on Lake park; but such building was not to remain longer than May 1, 1877. The time was afterwards extended. In 1889 W. T. Leland, an abutting property owner, procured an injunction from the circuit court of Cook county restraining the city and the Exposition Association from erecting any structure on that part of the park in section 15. The city then, on December 29, 1890, ordered the removal of all buildings from the park, except the two armories, and finally, on February 9, 1891, ordered the removal of the Exposition Building within the ninety days, and it was torn down. On March 30, 1891, an ordinance was passed giving the right of the World's Columbian Exposition to construct and maintain the building known as the "Art Institute" on the lake front, the title of the building to vest in the city, but the right to use and occupy the same to vest in the Art Institute as long as it should comply with the terms and conditions in the ordinance, which required free admission to the public on Wednesdays, Saturdays, and Sundays, with the right to charge admission at other times, though professors and teachers in the public schools and other institutions of learning in Chicago should be admitted free at all times. It was then sought to have the above injunction in the Leland Case modified to permit the erection of this building, and, such modification having been assented to in writing by all the property owners, it was accordingly modified, notwithstanding the objection of Mrs. Sarah A. Daggett, whose husband had signed her assent to the proposed modification. In pursuance of the permission thus granted, the Art Institute Building was subsequently erected, with a frontage of about 300 feet. In 1892 permission was given to erect a frame wigwam for the accommodation of the Democratic National Convention on the lake front, which was accordingly erected, and afterwards torn down, as required by the city. In the same year the use of the lake front north of Madison street for the construction of a temporary postoffice was tendered to the United States, and a temporary postoffice building erected in pursuance of such resolution, the same to be removed as soon as a permanent postoffice is built. In 1881 the city granted permission to Battery D to occupy 125 feet of Lake park north of Monroe street for an armory building, and also permission to the 1st regiment of cavalry to erect a similar building just north of the former. Both buildings were erected, of 125 feet front, one story high, extending nearly back to the railroad. In 1886 the city council granted a place of burial to the family of the late Gen. John

A. Logan in Lake park, on the recommendation of the corporation counsel that such use would not be inconsistent with its use as a park. During all this time there were numerous orders and resolutions of the city council directing the removal of tracks, platforms, express buildings, sheds, and other obstructions, nearly all of which have been removed from time to time. The defendants in error acquired the property they own on Michigan avenue in 1887 and 1889, and the original bill in this cause was filed by them in 1890. That the abutting property owners have been diligently striving to protect their rights in the park cannot be gainsaid by anyone familiar with the litigation that has been carried on in relation thereto, and with the repeated enunciations of the courts enforcing their rights. That they have quietly assented to repeated violations of these rights is not borne out by the facts in the case. Whether the city had the power to authorize the erection of the temporary buildings mentioned, it is not necessary here to inquire, but we cannot agree with counsel for plaintiff in error that the defendants in error have waived all their rights in the premises, because they may have chosen to waive some of them. The only permanent building, perhaps, that is excepted from the injunction is the Art Institute, and all the property owners gave their consent to its erection. It cannot be said that the erection of the Art Institute has so impaired the benefits to be derived from Lake park that thereby the whole easement is gone. The defendants in error paid $40,000 more for their property because of its location on the park, and would be seriously damaged by the erection of large and high permanent buildings, such as the city hall building and others.

The decree is affirmed.

WYOMING SUPREME COURT.

Re Estate of George L. BEARD, Deceased.

(.....Wyo.....)

The assets of an insolvent stockholder in an insolvent national bank, whether living or dead, are not, as against his other creditors, subject to a preferential lien for the payment of his liability, under U. S. Rev. Stat. §5132, for the debts of the bank for an amount equal to the par value of his stock.

(September 27, 1897.)

QUESTIONS reserved by the District Court for Laramie County for the opinion of the Supreme Court which arose upon an application by Joel Ware Foster, receiver of the Cheyenne National Bank, for preferential payment out of assets of the estate of George L. Beard, deceased. Preference disallowed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. Burke & Fowler and Edmund J. Churchill for receiver of Cheyenne National Bank.

Messrs. Clark & Breckons for administrator of George L. Beard.

Mr. John W. Lacey for creditors of George L. Beard's estate.

Conaway, Ch. J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The intestate left an estate insufficient to pay his debts in full. He was a stockholder in the Cheyenne National Bank, an insolvent corporation, now in the hands of Joel Ware Foster as receiver. Intestate was liable, under the laws of the United States upon the subject of banking, for the debts of the corporation to an amount equal to the par value of his stock in the corporation. This liability survives against his estate. The amount is fixed by the judgment and decree of the United States circuit court for the district of Wyoming at $6,139.93, and this amount is not in dispute. But Foster, as receiver of the Cheyenne National Bank, claims that this liability constitutes a preferred claim against the estate. He filed his motion in the district court for Laramie county—a court of probate jurisdiction, and having jurisdiction of this estate—that the administrator pay to him this claim in full, without regard to the assets

NOTE.—The above case is the first to decide the question of the right of a preferential lien to secure liability of a stockholder in a national bank.

and other liabilities of the estate, "for the reason," as stated in the motion, "that said claim aforesaid is a trust fund, and no part of the general assets of said estate." In the brief filed on behalf of the receiver, this proposition is stated in somewhat different language. It is claimed that the statute establishing the stockholder's liability "creates from his estate a trust fund for the payment of the debts of the bank," and, further, that the decree of the United States circuit court was based upon the ground that the statutory liability of the stockholder "created and carved from his assets a trust fund for the payment of the debts of the bank, and that, therefore, the assets of the decedent, to the amount of this guaranty or fund, constituted in fact no part of the general assets of the decedent's estate, but are trust funds, dedicated to the payment of this liability."

Upon the hearing of this cause in the district court, upon the motion of the receiver for preference in payment, that court found that important and difficult questions arose in the cause, and upon its own motion, and with consent of all parties, reserved and sent to this court for decision such questions. They are three in number: (1) Does the statutory liability of a stockholder of a national bank to pay towards its debts a sum equal to the face value of his stock create from his assets a trust fund for the payment of the debts of the bank? (2) Is the liability created by the statute mentioned in the last question entitled to preferential payment out of the funds of the insolvent debtor? (3) Where a stockholder of a national bank dies subsequent to the insolvency of the bank, but before any assessment is made on his stock on account of such insolvency, and after his death an assessment equal to the full value of his stock is made upon the administrator of his estate, and where his estate is insolvent, should such assessment be given a preference over the claims of general creditors?

It is not questioned that the entire assets of the intestate are held by the administrator in trust for the payment of the debts of the intestate. But this, of itself, does not give to any particular debt preference in payment over any other debt. The claim urged on behalf of the receiver is that the liability of intestate upon his bank stock is entitled to preference. Under U. S. Rev. Stat. § 5152, the administrator is not personally liable on account of this stock, but the estate and funds of intestate in his hands are liable in like manner, and to the same extent, as the intestate would be if living. It is not questioned that the principles involved are the same as if the liability of intestate had been for unpaid subscription upon his capital stock. One authority states the "trust fund" doctrine in such cases as follows: "It is a favorite doctrine of the American courts that the capital stock, and other property, of a corporation is to be deemed a trust fund for the payment of the debts of the corporation, so that the creditors have a lien or right of priority of payment on it, in preference to any of the stockholders of the corporation." Thompson, Liability of Stockholders, § 10. It is apparent that the doctrine must have a much more extensive application than this to sustain the claim of the receiver in the case at bar. In a note to the section quoted, the learned author says: "I have not found a similar statement of doctrine in any English book of reports. The idea appears to have been first formulated by the fertile brain of Mr. Justice Story in Wood v. Dummer, 3 Mason, 308 (decided in 1824)." But the case of Wood v. Dummer has been extensively followed by both Federal and state courts, and the doctrine of that case is perhaps now too firmly established in America to be denied. The case was a bill in equity brought by some of the creditors against some of the stockholders of the Hallowell & Augusta Bank, and sustained on the ground of the impossibility of bringing into the suit all the parties interested. There was a recovery against the stockholders, the trust fund doctrine being announced, as it appears, for the first time. No question of priority of payment arose. A good statement of the result of the cases upon this branch of the law of the liability of stockholders is given in 23 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law, at page 855, in these words: "The liability of members of a corporation is founded on statute. But in the modern stock corporation, where membership is usually acquired by entering into the contract of subscription, each member may be said to assume the obligation to pay to the company the full amount named in his contract, i. e., he agrees to pay the corporation only, and the satisfaction of its claims, in any manner acceptable to it, discharges him from further liability. But the American courts of equity have evolved the doctrine that by the act of subscription one becomes liable for the full amount thereof to corporate creditors as well as to the corporation; that all who deal with the latter have a right to rely upon the total amount subscribed as a security for their claims,—in a word, and in the language of the courts themselves, that unpaid subscriptions are a 'trust fund' for the payment of creditors. While in its origin this doctrine is distinctively American, and does not obtain in England, yet by statute, a limited application of similar principles is there allowed. The more recent applications of the doctrine have been subjected to considerable criticism in this country." This statement of the law is sustained by numerous citation of cases, and is followed by a discussion of the applications of the doctrine; but nothing appears to indicate that it has ever been applied to give to the stockholder's liability for unpaid subscriptions for stock a preference in payment over other debts of the stockholder. Neither have counsel cited a case in which such application of the trust fund doctrine has been made. Neither has such a case fallen otherwise under our observation.

In the case of Thompson v. Reno Sav. Bank, 19 Nev. 242, it was held that it was not necessary to present to the executor or administrator of a deceased stockholder a claim for unpaid subscription to the capital stock of the bank before bringing an action thereon, although the statute provided that no holder of any claim against the estate of a decedent should maintain an action, unless such presentation had first been made. The following reason is given in the opinion of the court: "The stockholders are trustees of the creditors, and suits to establish and enforce the trust are maintained against the representatives of deceased persons, upon the theory that the decedent held money equal to the amount of his unpaid subscription, in trust for the creditors, and that the fund, although incapable of identification, has passed into the hands of the executor or administrator. Such a fund is properly no part of the estate of a deceased person. The deceased stockholders were trustees, and not debtors, of the bank's creditors."

The doctrine of this case fully sustains the contention of the receiver. If the administrator has taken possession of any money or property that did not belong to the intestate, and did belong either to the bank or its creditors, he should deliver such money or property to the receiver, who represents both the bank and its creditors. But no trust fund in money and no trust property ever passed into the hands of intestate from any source. The trust is purely constructive; the fund is purely constructive. It may have no existence in fact. The stockholder may have neither property nor money, but his debt to the corporation for unpaid subscription for stock is held to be a trust fund. The corporation, according to the American doctrine, may not release the debt to the prejudice of its creditors without payment in full. If the corporation does release the stockholder without full payment, the creditors of the corporation may resort to the stockholder for payment to the extent of the stockholder's liability for unpaid subscriptions. To this extent the cases go, and some seem to go further; but I do not find any case that goes to the extent of charging the property of a stockholder with a trust or lien on account of his unpaid subscriptions for stock.

The doctrine of the Nevada case, however, would lead to that result. It was a suit in equity by a judgment creditor of an insolvent corporation to subject unpaid subscriptions for stock to the payment of his debt. Two of the defendants were representatives of deceased stockholders. Of the conclusion that the statute requiring claims to be presented to the executors or administrators of deceased persons before suit did not apply in that case, one commentator says: "It is believed that this conclusion cannot be upheld upon principle. The rule which allows a trust fund to be followed from hand to hand, and recovered, is believed to apply only in cases where the fund is earmarked or separated from the remainder of the estate of the trustee in such a manner that it can be identified." 3 Thomp. Corp. § 8328. And this suggests the question which must arise in every case under the doctrine of the Nevada court, what portion of the property of the stockholder constitutes the trust fund, which is properly no part of his estate? Does the trust attach to all of his property? Does anyone purchasing his property with knowledge of his indebtedness to a corporation for unpaid subscription for stock take the property subject to the trust? No court has answered these questions directly, because no court has made the application of the trust-fund doctrine urged on behalf of the receiver in the case at bar; and, on the other hand, it must be said that no court has ruled directly against this application of the doctrine. It seems that none of the courts have been called upon to rule directly upon the exact question presented here. The application of the trust-fund doctrine claimed here is evidently a new application of that doctrine.

The case of Peters v. Bain, 183 U. S. 670, 33 L. ed. 696, cited by counsel, has, however, a direct bearing upon the question under consideration. Bain & Bro. were directors and stockholders to a large amount in the Exchange National Bank of Norfolk. The bank was insolvent; Bain & Bro. were insolvent. They made an assignment of all of their property for the benefit of their creditors. Peters, receiver of the Exchange National Bank of Norfolk, brought the action by bill in equity to set aside the assignment, and subject the assigned property to the payment of debts due the bank. The liability of the Bains on account of their stock is considered, beginning at page 691, 183 U. S., and page 704, 33 L. ed. (opinion of Chief Justice Fuller). The validity of the deed of assignment and the trust-fund doctrine are disposed of in the following language: "Counsel contends that the deed was in contravention of §§ 5151 and 5284 of the Revised Statutes of the United States, which provide that the shareholders of every national banking association shall be held individually responsible for its debts to the extent of the amount of their stock, and additional thereto, and that the controller may enforce that individual liability. It is insisted that the capital stock is a trust fund of which the directors are the trustees, and that the creditors have a lien upon it in equity; that this applies to the liability upon the stock of a national bank; and that no general assignment of his property for the payment of his debts can lawfully be made by a shareholder, certainly not when he is a director. Undoubtedly unpaid subscriptions to stock are assets, and have frequently been treated by courts of equity as if impressed with a trust sub modo, in the sense that neither the stockholders nor the corporation can misappropriate such subscriptions so far as creditors are concerned. Washburn v. Green (Richardson v. Green), 188 U. S. 80, 44, 33 L. ed. 516, 522. Creditors have the same right to look to them as to anything else, and the same right to insist upon their payment as upon the payment of any other debt due to the corporation. The shareholder cannot transfer his shares when the corporation is failing, or manipulate a release therefrom, for the purpose of escaping his liability. And the principle is the same where the shares are paid up, but the shareholder is responsible in respect thereof to an equal additional amount. There was, however, no attempt here to avoid this liability, and the fact of its existence did not operate to fetter these assignors in the otherwise lawful disposition of their property for the benefit of their creditors." This needs no comment. It appears to leave no room for the application of the trust fund doctrine to the extent of giving to the receiver or to the creditors of an insolvent corporation preference in payment from the estate of an insolvent stockholder as against the general creditors of such stockholder, whether he be living or dead. The trust, evidently, can have no greater effect on the property in the hands of an administrator than in the hands of the assignee.

Of the three questions submitted, the first is answered "Yes" to the extent indicated in this opinion. The second and third are answered in the negative.

OREGON SUPREME COURT.

Malinda F. McLENNAN, Appt.,

v.

Charles McLENNAN, Resp't.

(.....Or.....)

A marriage contracted in another state by a resident of Oregon who has been divorced in that state by a decree from which there is yet time to take an appeal is absolutely void under 1 Hill's Anno. Laws, § 508, providing that a divorce decree shall terminate the marriage, "except that neither party shall be capable of contracting marriage with a third person" until the expiration of the period allowed for an appeal.

(November 8, 1897.)

APP^{EAL} by plaintiff from a judgment of the Circuit Court for Multnomah County in favor of defendant in an action brought to obtain a decree to declare void a marriage which had been contracted in alleged contravention to the provisions of the statute. Reversed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Mr. S. R. Harrington, for appellant:

A decree of divorce does not absolutely terminate the marriage relation, nor entirely free the parties from its obligation and liabilities until the expiration of the time allowed in which to take an appeal. A marriage before the expiration of six months from the rendition of the decree is absolutely void.

A decree of divorce fixes the status of the parties—their "legal position in regard to the rest of the community"—and that status cannot be confined to the state in which the decree is rendered, but goes with the parties to any state or country to which they may temporarily or permanently remove.

Nelson, Divorce & Separation, §§ 27 et seq.

Messrs. Charles F. Lord and Thad. S. Potter, for the State:

The decree of divorce terminates the marriage relation.

Hill's Code, § 508.

The disqualification for marriage imposed by § 508, Hill's Code, upon the parties to a suit for divorce, has no extraterritorial effect.

NOTE.—As to the effect of a right of appeal from divorce decree on the right to remarry, see Re Smith (Wash.) 17 L. R. A. 578, and note.

As to the effect of statutes prohibiting remarriage after divorce, see Hernandez's Succession (La.) 24 L. R. A. 331, and note; also Ovitt v. Smith (Vt.) 35 L. R. A. 223, and Crawford v. State (Miss.) 35 L. R. A. 224.

Bean, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

On September 8, 1889, the plaintiff was divorced by the circuit court of Multnomah county, from her husband, and in twenty two days thereafter, while still a resident of and domiciled in this state, was married in Vancouver, Washington, to the present defendant, who was at the time also a resident and domiciled here. The plaintiff, being advised that the latter marriage was premature and unlawful, brought this suit to declare it void; which being decided adversely to her, she brings the cause here by appeal. The sole question presented on the appeal is as to the validity of the Vancouver marriage, and its determination depends upon the construction of § 503 of our statute (1 Hill's Anno. Laws), and its effect upon marriages solemnized in a neighboring state. By this section it is provided that "a decree declaring a marriage void or dissolved at the suit or claim of either party shall have the effect to terminate such a marriage as to both parties, except that neither party shall be capable of contracting marriage with a third person, and if he or she does so contract, shall be liable therefor as if such decree had not been given, until the suit has been heard and determined on appeal, and if no appeal be taken, the expiration of the period allowed by this Code to take such appeal." It is clear that a marriage in this state in violation of this section would be null and void, because, by its provisions, the parties are incapable of entering into such a relation within the time specified, for the reason that the decree does not to that extent terminate the former marriage. The statute in effect declares that such marriage shall, for that purpose, continue during the time in which an appeal may be taken from the decree, or, in case of an appeal, during the pendency thereof. Until the expiration of such time, the status of the parties, so far as the right to remarry is concerned, remains the same as if no decree had been rendered. For all other purposes the decree is full and complete, but, on grounds of public policy, the legislature has provided that pending an appeal from such decree, if one be taken, and, if not, during the time in which it may be taken, the parties shall be incapable of contracting marriage with a third person, and under this provision of the law, neither of them has any more right to do so than if the decree had not been given. During that time the decree is suspended or inoperative to that extent, and both parties, without regard to their guilt, are utterly powerless to make a valid contract of marriage with a third person. It will be observed that the statute declares that neither party to the decree shall be capable of contracting marriage with a third person during the time such decree is subject to review by an appellate tribunal, and not merely that it shall not be lawful for them to do so. It goes directly to their ability or capacity to contract, and there is a distinction made in the books between the marriage of divorced parties declared by law incapable of remarrying and a marriage in violation of some statutory prohibition penal in its nature. In the one case the marriage is absolutely void, and in the other it is often held to be valid, although the party may be punished criminally for violating the prohibitory statute. This distinction is very clearly pointed out by Judge Clark in Conn v. Conn, 2 Kan. App. 419. The obvious purpose and object of the statute is to enable either party aggrieved by a decree of divorce to have the same reviewed in an appellate court, and to that end it is provided that pending such right neither party shall be capable of doing an act which would render a reversal nugatory. A construction of the statute which would permit a marriage within the time limited would be, not only contrary to its plain wording and evident intent, but would produce, in case of a reversal of the decree, the anomalous result of one person having two legal husbands or wives, as the case may be, at the same time, and polygamy be thus sanctioned by law. It was to prevent the confusion and uncertainty resulting from such a condition of affairs that the statute was enacted, and it must be given force and effect.

The supreme court of the state of Kansas had occasion, in Willite v. Willite, 41 Kan. 154, to construe this statute; and it was there held that a marriage contracted in that state within six months after one of the parties had been divorced from her former husband by a decree of one of the courts of the state was absolutely null and void. The opinion of Mr. Justice Johnston in that case contains a very lucid and satisfactory discussion of this question. The same construction has been given to a similar statute in the state of Washington by the supreme court of that state, in Re Smith, 4 Wash. 702, 17 L. R. A. 573. Indeed, it is not seriously contended that a marriage contracted in this state within the prohibited time would be valid; but the contention is that, as the marriage in question was solemnized in the state of Washington, the plaintiff was freed from the restraint imposed upon her by the decree of divorce. The general rule is unquestioned that a marriage between persons sui juris, valid where solemnized, is valid everywhere; but this plaintiff, having been previously married, and her former husband being alive, could not contract a second valid marriage anywhere unless the incapacity arising from her previous marriage had been at the time effectively and completely removed by a decree of divorce, and this was not the case at the time of the solemnization of the marriage between plaintiff and defendant, because the statute under which the decree was obtained provided that the divorce did not completely sever the tie of marriage, so as to enable either to become a party to a new one, until the lapse of a specified time after the decree, and her marriage was contracted in violation of this statute. This provision of the law is an integral part of the decree, by which alone both of the parties to a divorce proceeding can be relieved from the incapacity to marry, and the marriage by a person divorced in this state, and domiciled here, in violation of its provisions, is a mere nullity when called in question in the courts of the state, although such marriage may have been contracted in another state. 1 Nelson, Divorce & Separation, § 135; 1 Bishop, Mar. & Div. § 436; Warter v. Warter, L. R. 15 Prob. Div. 152; Chichester v. Mure, 8 Swab. & T. 223. The rule announced in the cases of Com. v. Lane, 113 Mass. 458, 18 Am. Rep. 509, and Van Voorhis v. Brintnall, 86 N. Y. 18, 40 Am. Rep. 505, and other cases cited of similar import, is relied upon by the defense. The doctrine of these cases is that a statute prohibiting a marriage of the guilty party in a divorce proceeding, during the lifetime of the other, or except under certain conditions, does not render void the marriage of such person out of the jurisdiction of the state in which the decree was obtained. Upon this question there is some conflict in the authorities (Pennegar v. State, 87 Tenn. 244, 2 L. R. A. 703; 5 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law, p. 841); but the obvious distinction between the question presented in the cases referred to and in the case at bar is that there the incapacity to remarry attached only to the guilty party. The decree of divorce absolutely terminated the marriage relation between the parties as effectually as if it had been dissolved by death. The innocent party was perfectly free to remarry at any time, and the restraint upon the other was imposed as a punishment, and was therefore penal in its nature, and, as such, held inoperative out of the jurisdiction where it was inflicted. The provision of our statute is not imposed as a punishment, nor is it penal in its character, but it implies to the innocent as well as the guilty. It goes to the capacity of either party to remarry within the prescribed time, and therefore the cases cited and the doctrine contended for have no application to the question in hand.

We are clear, therefore, that the plaintiff's marriage, having been contracted before the expiration of the time allowed by law in which to appeal from a decree of divorce, is absolutely void, and the decree of the court below must be reversed; and it is so ordered.

I. PUBLIC, OFFICIAL, AND STATUTORY MATTERS.

International law.

A very unusual question of international law is presented in a Federal case, which denies a private right of action by a citizen of the United States against a military commander of revolutionary forces in Venezuela for assault and false imprisonment, at least since the United States has recognized the revolutionary government. (C. C. App. 2d C.) 403.

Equality.

A statute prohibiting citizens from other counties from fishing in the waters of two specified counties without a license, but not prohibiting citizens of those counties from fishing in other counties, is held to violate the constitutional provision for equal protection of the laws. (S. C.) 561.

A statute requiring a license for peddling is held to make an arbitrary distinction constituting partial class legislation when it exempts farmers, nurserymen, mechanics, manufacturers, and butchers who sell their own manufactures or products. (Minn.) 677.

Taking or impairing private property.

The Ohio act adopting the Torrens system of land registration is held unconstitutional as depriving adverse claimants of title without due process of law, attempting to take property for uses not public, and also as attempting to confer judicial power on the county recorder. (Ohio) 519.

A statute authorizing administration on the estate of a person who has left home and has not been heard from in seven years is held to be unconstitutional, since the administration of the estate of a living person deprives him of property without due process of law. (R. I.) 294.

A statute limiting the liability of a railroad company for fires to the difference between the amount of loss and the insurance on the property is held not to deprive the insurer of the equal protection of the laws, nor to impair the obligation of their pre existing contracts. (Me.) 152.

The constitutionality of an ordinance fixing water rates is discussed at much length in a case holding it invalid because it did not produce just compensation to the owner of the water plant. In this case it gave a net income of about 8½ per cent. (Cal.) 460.

The right of a city to take water for its inhabitants from a great pond belonging to the state is held to be within the power of the legislature to grant without any compensation to those who want the power for mill purposes. (Me.) 188.

Police power; as to nuisances.

A statute requiring all railroad and transportation companies to turn over to storage companies or public warehousemen all property not called for within twenty days after notice to the consignee is held unconstitutional and void because not a proper exercise of the police power. (Minn.) 672.

A statute authorizing a board of aldermen to order any privy vault to be filled up and destroyed is sustained as constitutional although it does not provide for any notice to the owner of the premises before making and enforcing the order. (R. I.) 305.

The business of a scavenger, or the removal of night soil, is held to be within the control of a city having power to make all ordinances for the protection of health. (Minn.) 675.

An ordinance making it unlawful to keep any hog within the corporate limits of a town is held to be not subject to attack for unreasonableness, where the statutes give power to define nuisances and to regulate and control the keeping of animals. (S. C.) 326.

The attempt of a municipal corporation by ordinance to declare that any partially destroyed building which is permitted to remain in that condition after notice to remove, repair, or rebuild it, shall constitute a nuisance, is held to be void on the ground that a municipality cannot declare that to be a nuisance which in fact is not, although it has authority to declare what shall constitute a nuisance. (Ind.) 161.

Jurisdiction.

Jurisdiction of a state court to direct as to the payment of wages by a receiver for operating a railroad within the state is held not to be prevented by the fact that the employees in the course of their services crossed the state boundary and incidentally performed some services in another state, where the receiver-ship was first created. (Conn.) 804.

Judges.

The constitutional power of the governor to appoint judges of an inferior court is protected against a statute which attempts to deprive him thereof by changing the name of the court and providing for the election of the judge. (N. J.) 878.

Officers.

The eligibility of a woman to be a county clerk in Missouri is sustained under a constitutional provision which requires an officer to be a "citizen of the United States" and a resident of the state "one year next preceding his election." The use of the masculine pronoun in that provision in the statutes is held not to exclude women, since there are express constitutional provisions limiting eligibility to men in respect to some other offices, and the word "male," which formerly was found in the statutes respecting county clerks, has been dropped. (Mo.) 208.

Enacting statutes.

The constitutional provision as to the enactment of bills by aye and nay vote and after three several readings, etc., are held mandatory, and the journals of both houses must affirmatively show compliance with the constitutional provisions. (Id.) 74.

II. CONTRACTUAL AND COMMERCIAL RELATIONS.

An employee who has learned trade secrets from his employer under an agreement, express or implied, that he will not make use of them for his own benefit, or communicate them to strangers, is held subject to injunction against breaking such agreement. (Mich.) 200.

The rule that one person cannot be compelled to enter into business relations with another is applied to the refusal of undertakers to furnish materials or render services at a funeral for a person who has refused or failed to pay for similar services in the past. (Ky.) 505.

The illegality of a transfer of stock to the president of a company for use in corrupting public officers is held not to prevent the owner from recovering it when it has not been used for the illegal purpose but has been converted by the president to his own use, since the right of action does not depend upon the illegal contract. (Cal.) 176.

Breach of contract.

In case of the refusal of a vendee in an executory contract to stand by his agreement, it is held that the other party, having an option to deliver between two subsequent dates, if he wishes to have the damages fixed on any day before the last day for performance, must give notice of such intention, although his offer to perform is waived by the other party's repudiation of the agreement. His mere executory contract to sell the same property to another person before the time for delivery is held not to constitute a breach of the contract on his

Tolls.

Tolls for the use of a road by persons riding bicycles are held not to be authorized by a statute providing for the payment of tolls for carriages or vehicles drawn by animals, also for a horse and rider or led horse. (Mich.) 198.

Voters.

Ability to read the Constitution of the state, which is required of a voter by the Wyoming Constitution, is held to mean the Constitution in the English language, and not in a translation. (Wyo.) 778.

Streets.

The caving of an excavation under a street, negligently made for an underground railroad, is held not to make the city liable. (Va.) 834.

A charter authorizing a street-railroad company to use any power which the mayor and city council may sanction, or which any other company is authorized to use, is held to give the right to use the trolley system without the sanction of the mayor and council, when other companies have been authorized by statute to use it. (Md.) 509.

The liability of a city to an action for delay in providing a fund by assessment to pay for a street improvement is denied,—at least so long as there can be any remedy by enforcing the plan of assessments. (Wash.) 259.

Lighting city.

The right of a municipality to own an electric-light plant to furnish lights to its citizens as well as for public uses is sustained in Michigan. (Mich.) 157.

part, even if an actual sale of it would be. (N. D.) 760

Innkeepers.

The right of an innholder who has no license to recover for board and lodging at his inn is denied under a statute which prohibits the keeping of an inn without a license. (Me.) 148.

Lease.

An assignment of a lease with covenant against encumbrances, except the agreements of the lessee, is held not to import a personal liability of the assignee to perform them. (Ill.) 624.

Negotiable paper.

Payments indorsed on the back of a note before its transfer by the payee are held not to destroy its negotiability. (Pa.) 823.

The addition of the word "trustee" to the name of an indorser on a note is held not to affect his liability, and the same is held as to the addition of that word to the name of the payee. (Tenn.) 837.

A statute requiring the words "peddler's note" to be written across every note given for an article sold by a peddler or itinerant person is held valid as applied to the sale of a patent right. (Ky.) 508.

The drawer of a draft which is lost in the mails during transmission from the payee to a correspondent at the place where the payee is located is held to be discharged by the failure to present the draft or discover its loss for nearly six months, although the payee had means of knowledge of the loss in a report from the correspondent. It is also held that a duplicate draft given to enable the payee to collect from the drawee did not constitute a new contract or a promise to pay, or a waiver of a defense on the original contract. (N. D.) 848.

Carriers.

A railroad employee working on a bridge is held to become a passenger when he rides home on a train after his work for the day is done, under a contract giving him the right to free transportation. (Pa.) 876.

The ejection from a train of a woman who has paid fare for herself, but refuses to pay for a child in her custody, is held lawful on condition that her fare is returned or tendered to her, less the amount of fare for herself and the child for the distance already traveled. (Ohio) 140.

A contract by an express company with a railroad company, exempting the latter from all liability for injuries to a messenger who authorizes the contract, is held binding on him, since the railroad in this matter is acting as a private carrier. (Ind.) 938.

Delivery of goods to a consignee without his production of the bill of lading is held sufficient to relieve the carrier, where it had no notice that the bill had been forwarded with a draft attached for collection. (Ark.) 358.

An exemption of "accidents to boilers and machinery" in a bill of lading is held insufficient to exempt a railroad company from liability for injuries caused by the breaking of the axle of a car, as this is not "machinery" within the meaning of that phrase. (U. C. App. 6th C.) 271.

Insurance.

Certificates in mutual aid societies are held not to constitute insurance within the meaning of a question in an application blank of an insurance company as to "existing insurance." (C. C. App. 6th C.) 83.

An assignable interest of a person to whom an endowment certificate in a benefit society is payable on the death of the assured within the endowment period does not exist during that period, and while the assured is living, if the latter has a right to change the beneficiary. (Iowa) 128.

Statements by an applicant for insurance which the terms of the policy warrant to be strictly true and agree to be a part of the contract are to be deemed warranties, and not mere representations. (R. I.) 297.

A contract by which a railroad employee is given his election to take benefits from a relief fund or to sue his employer for damages, but making an acceptance of the benefit operate to release his employer, is not contrary to public policy. (Ill.) 750.

A variety of important questions respecting the settlement of an insolvent insurance company are decided in a Maryland case. Among them is the decision that insurance of a carrier against liability for injury to passengers is not against public policy. (Md.) 97.

The construction of the provision as to total disability to transact any and every kind of business pertaining to one's occupation is made by holding that trivial acts do not constitute transacting of business if one is unable to transact it substantially or to some material extent. (Minn.) 587.

Another case holds that the fact that one went to his office every day, where he carried on the business of loaning money on personal security, did not show that he was not totally disabled, if he did no work or business at the office during the time for which he claimed indemnity. (Mich.) 529.

A reinsurer in case of the insolvency of a prior insurer is held liable for the whole amount of loss to which it had indemnified the other insurer, and not merely for such part thereof as the insolvent company actually paid. (N. H.) 514.

A mortgage, although in the form of an absolute deed, is held not to constitute any change in the title, interest, or possession of the property of the insured within the policy providing that it shall be void in case of such change. (Ohio) 562.

Change of title by deed from mortgagor to mortgagee pending an application for insurance is held not fatal to the insurance after the policy is delivered, if the application states the existence of the mortgage and the pendency of foreclosure proceedings. (Wash.) 397.

III. CORPORATIONS AND ASSOCIATIONS.

A receiver of a corporation because of dissensions between the two persons who constitute its officers and are equal owners of its entire stock is denied, especially when their dissensions relate chiefly to the management of another corporation some of the shares of which are owned by the former. (Iowa) 122. See also infra, V.

Duration; reversion of property.

A conveyance to a corporation which has an existence for a limited period is held not to be limited to the life of the corporation, or to give the grantor a resulting trust which will take effect when the corporation ceases to exist. (N. C.) 240.

Abuse of franchise.

A plumbers' supply association organized under a provision for charitable, educational, 88 I. R. A.

and social companies, which assumes to notify its members of the failure of a dealer to pay any of them, and to prevent them from giving any credit thereafter to the delinquent, is held to be officiously interfering with matters outside its proper business, and subject to attack by an information in the nature of a quo warranto. (Mass.) 194.

Nonuser of franchise.

The forfeiture of the franchise, and also of the road, of a street-railway company is enforced under a clause of the ordinance granting the franchise, to the effect that it should be forfeited for failure to operate the road for one year. (Minn.) 541.

The forfeiture of the franchise of a street-railway company granted by ordinance is held to be made by nonuser of the tracks for several years, although the city may have agreed that nonuser should not constitute a forfeiture, and the ouster of the company from the franchise is held to be properly made in quo warranto proceedings by the state on relation of the city. (Mo.) 218.

Lease of franchise.

A constitutional provision against the lease of any franchise so as to relieve it or the property held under it from the liability of the lessor or lessee is construed to make a leased railroad liable to the enforcement of a judgment against the lessee for injuries to an employee, but not to make the lessor, by a fiction, the employer of such person. (Cal.) 71.

Lien for stockholder's liability.

The assets of an insolvent stockholder in an insolvent national bank are held not to be subject to any preferential lien for the payment of the stockholder's liability. (Wyo.) 860.

Preference to employees.

A person employed by a mowing machine company to sell machines, as well as to set them up and unpack and repack them when necessary, is held to be an employee, within the meaning of a statute giving a preference to claims of employees, operators, and laborers of corporations. (N. Y.) 102.

Stock.

The right of a married woman to hold stock in a national bank of another state is held to depend on the law of her domicile. (Md.) 119.

One holding stock as an attorney or trustee of an infant without anything to show that fact on the books of the corporation is held liable as a stockholder. Id.

Increase of stock.

The increase of the capital stock of a corporation by an amendment of its by-laws is held valid, where the Constitution of the company provides that the amount of capital may be fixed by the by-laws. (C. C. App. 6th C.) 616.

A contract between proposed shareholders of a corporation which has not yet come into existence, to the effect that they will not transfer their shares without giving the company an option to purchase them, is held to be ineffectual in favor of the corporation, and not to be ratified by its mere issue of stock to such persons. (R. I.) 299.

Bonus stock.

Corporate stock issued as a bonus to third persons to induce them to advance money to the corporation on mortgage security is held valid as against existing creditors of the company. (Mich.) 490.

Charities.

An incorporated institution for the blind largely supported by state appropriations is held to be a charitable institution so far as it supports indigent pupils, and therefore subject to that extent to the visitation and rules of the board of charities, although as to paying pupils it may be only an educational institution. (N. Y.) 591.

In a case which reviews the authorities quite extensively, it is held that a bequest to an incorporated charitable institution in excess of the amount which general laws permit such corporations to take is merely voidable, and can be avoided only by the state itself, and not by the relatives of the deceased. (Me.) 339.

Foreign corporations.

A contract of an unauthorized foreign corporation is held valid in a Rhode Island case under statutes which do not expressly declare it void. (R. I.) 545.

The right of a foreign corporation to purchase or solicit wool by an agent is upheld as a transaction in interstate commerce, although the corporation had not complied with the conditions imposed by a statute on the right to do business in the state. (Mont.) 367.

The court refuses to interfere with the internal management of a foreign electric light company at the suit of a resident stockholder, although the tangible property of the company consisting of conduits in the streets, is within the state. (Pa.) 638.

Loan association.

Notice of withdrawals given before the appointment of a receiver of a loan association are held to give no priority after insolvency where the by-laws provide that not more than 80 per cent of the receipts of the loan fund should be applied on withdrawals. (Iowa) 188.

Seceding members—name taken.

The members who withdrew from the Knights of Pythias and formed a new order because the old order would not permit them to have the ritual in the German language are held entitled to take for the new organization the name "Improved Order, Knights of Pythias." (Mich.) 658.

Limited partnership.

For the purpose of an action against a Pennsylvania limited partnership in Massachusetts, it is held that it is to be regarded as an association or partnership, and can be sued in its company name. (Mass.) 791.

The formation of a limited partnership is held not to make the members liable as general partners merely for technical irregularities. (Mich.) 798.

Payment of subscriptions to the capital stock of a limited partnership is held sufficiently made by promissory note, where that was immediately turned into money. (Mich.) 794.

Religious society.

The call of a Presbyterian society to a pastor is held, under the rules of that church, to be ineffective until formally sanctioned by the presbytery, and the refusal thereof to be fatal to the contract. (Okla.) 687.

IV. DOMESTIC RELATIONS.

The rule that the welfare of the child is the determining consideration in awarding its custody is applied to a contest between a guardian appointed where the child has actually resided for several years and a guardian appointed in another state on the father's application at his technical domicile. (Conn.) 471.

The provision in a statute that divorce terminates marriage, except that neither party shall be capable of contracting marriage with a third person until the time for an appeal has expired, renders a marriage within that time, though contracted in another state, utterly void. (Or.) 863.

The common-law right of a husband to a right of action for the loss of consortium through an injury to his wife caused by negligence is not taken away by the Massachusetts statutes giving married women the control of their time and actions. (Mass.) 631.

The right of a married woman abandoned by her husband to an action in her own name without joining him against one who caused the abandonment is sustained, where the statutes give her the right to contract and also to set up as a counterclaim when sued for tort any damages arising out of the same transaction. (N. C.) 242.

A diamond shirt stud worn by a husband is held to be a family expense within the meaning of a statute charging such expenses upon the property of both husband and wife or either of them. (Iowa) 847.

The liability of a wife to support her husband out of her separate estate in the exceptional case provided for by the California statute is held to be enforceable by an order of court in an equity proceeding because of the want of an adequate remedy at law. (Cal.) 175.

For improvements made by a husband's earnings on his wife's land it is held that she is liable to his creditors up to the amount of the enhancement of the value of her property thereby, and that the husband cannot be charged with any rent for the use of the premises by the family,—at least in the absence of any agreement therefor. (Me.) 190.

V. FIDUCIARIES.

The attempt of a receiver to enforce the individual liability of stockholders for debts of the corporation is denied in the absence of a statute authorizing it. (Illn.) 413.

See also supra, III.

VI. TORTS; NEGLIGENCE; INJURIES.

The actual use of force is held not to be necessary to constitute intimidation by strikers who make a display of force. (Pa.) 833.

An action against a hospital for an unauthorized autopsy on the body of a child is held maintainable by the father who placed the child there for treatment. (Mass.) 413.

Negligence.

For damages done by drifting logs which had broken from a raft in a violent storm without fault of the owner, and had been left floating until a later violent storm arose, it is held that the owner is not liable, although he has not definitely abandoned them, if he is proceeding to recover them as fast as he can without unreasonable expense. (La.) 134.

A bystander injured by the bolting of a vicious horse from a race track is denied a right of action where no negligence on the part of the fair association is shown, and the owner of the horse is not shown to have known that he was vicious, while the bystander negligently remained where he had been warned against standing. (N. C.) 156.

As to premises.

A defective railing on a platform of a grain elevator is held not to make the owner liable to a person who is injured by its fall while he is leaning against it, as this is putting it to a use for which it is not intended. (Mich.) 665.

A landlord is held not to be liable for injury to a person delivering goods to a tenant by falling into an elevator well which was dangerously defective because of a large opening between the elevator and the well, where the tenant had covenanted to repair and the landlord was not in possession or control of the elevator. (R. I.) 716.

An excavation on railroad premises, so near a path to a station platform as to be dangerous, is held to be insufficient to make the railroad company liable for the death of a child who falls into it while playing along the path. (Tex.) 573.

Injured passengers.

It is held to be negligence, as a matter of law, to jump from an electric street car running 4 or 5 miles an hour. (Pa.) 786.

A passenger on a railway train stopped by tanks of burning oil upon the track is not allowed to recover against the carrier for injuries caused by an explosion of the oil when he had unnecessarily exposed himself by going too close to it. (Wis.) 419.

Injury to a passenger on an excursion boat by the careless discharge of a loaded gun in the hands of another passenger is held to make the carrier liable if it failed to exercise reasonable care after there was reason to expect or anticipate danger. (Tenn.) 427.

The authority of a brakeman on a freight train to eject a passenger so as to make the master liable for his acts in so doing is held not to be implied from rules prohibiting such trains to carry passengers, and requiring the brakeman to know the rules, where it is also provided that such brakemen are subject to the orders of the conductors. (Mich.) 666.

Others injured by cars.

The negligence of a boy in standing so near a passing train as to be drawn under it by a current of air is held to be a question for the jury, and not of law for the court. (Mo.) 633.

Operating a dummy line of cars in a street at slow rate with occasional stops is held not to be negligence so as to create a liability for injury to a child which gets on the car and falls or is thrown off, although precautions were not taken to keep children from getting on. (Ala.) 458.

The rule that persons crossing a railroad must look and listen is held applicable to those operating an electric street car at a crossing, but the failure of the railroad company to give the statutory signals is held to preclude an action by it against the electric company for damages resulting from a collision. (N. J.) 516.

The rule that one must stop, look, and listen before attempting to cross a railway track is held applicable to an electric railway in a street, by the supreme court of Louisiana. (La.) 708.

Running a tank car along an electric street railway with black coats hanging and waving from it so as to frighten horses is held to make the street-railway company liable unless reasonable care to prevent such result is exercised, and this is held to be a question for the jury. (N. J.) 236.

The fact that a statute requiring signals at railroad crossings does not apply to farm crossings is held not to exempt the railroad company from liability to give signals, when required in the exercise of reasonable care, at peculiarly dangerous farm crossings, when a train is running at great speed. (Minn.) 302.

VII. PROPERTY RIGHTS; WILLS; LIENS.

A remarkable case as to the effect of a consent decree in partition giving one party a life estate only with remainder at her death to children then living or issue of such as may be dead holds that the remainder is contingent, and the fee during such contingency is not in abeyance but continues to abide in the life tenant, and upon her death without children or their issue surviving becomes absolute again, subject to disposal by her will. (Tenn.) 679.

Expectancy.

A written instrument to transfer a share of a mere expectancy is held not to be valid, where there was no consideration or any controversy or dispute to be settled thereby. (Pa.) 378.

Coal.

Adverse possession of the surface of land is held not to affect the title to underlying coal. (Pa.) 826.

Oil.

A life tenant who is also a tenant in common of the reversion is held liable to account for oil which he extracts from the land under a supposed right to do so, believing himself to be the sole owner. (W. Va.) 694.

Fixtures.

A striking case of the removal of fixtures from a mortgaged building is one in which what is called the standing finish, including window and door sashes, jambs and trimmings, wainscoting, baseboards, mantel piece, and doors were removed in default of payment, in accordance with a contract between the contractor and the mortgagor to the effect that the title should remain in the contractor until payment was made. (Wash.) 267.

Easement to use elevator.

The right to use an elevator to convey goods from a sidewalk to a basement or vice versa is held not to be appurtenant to a lease of the basement, where such use was not originally intended to accompany the use of the basement, and the connection between them was through another room which was not a common passageway. (Mass.) 149.

Waters; riparian rights.

Although a city may have wrongfully taken considerable part of the waters of a stream to the damage of a riparian owner he cannot require the sewage into which the waters have gone to be returned to the stream above his mill, but the disposal thereof must be left to the control of the city. (Conn.) 474.

A riparian proprietor upon navigable water is held not to be entitled to any compensation 88 L. R. A.

for cutting off his access to the water by municipal improvement of the water front for the benefit of navigation, as his riparian rights are subordinate to navigation. (N. Y.) 606.

A diversion of water from a stream to non-riparian lands by one to whom the riparian owner has assumed to grant such right is held unlawful as against a lower riparian proprietor. (Cal.) 181.

The submergence of lands dedicated for a public park with the express condition that no buildings shall be erected thereon does not free it from the restrictions on the subsequent reclamation of the lands. (Ill.) 849.

The right to go in boats and hunt wild fowl on a marsh surrounding an island in a river where the water is 10 or 12 inches deep, but where the land is at other times dry and covered with rushes, is denied to those who do not get the consent of the owner of the land, as such water is not navigable. (Mich.) 205.

Deed.

An attempt by the grantor to prevent the passing of title by a deed to his natural son which he had delivered to a deputy clerk with instructions to have it proved by the subscribing witness and registered, which was not done at the time because of the clerk's absence, was held ineffectual, although he obtained the deed again before it was actually proved, and destroyed it, and the grantee knew nothing of the delivery or the recall of the deed. (N. C.) 238.

Railroad fence.

Inclosed lands through which a railroad right of way must be fenced are held to be those which have such line of obstacle of any sort between them and other land as to set them off as private property, although the fence is not at all times maintained as a lawful fence which will prevent cattle from passing through at any point. (Va.) 570.

Trust for charity.

A devise in trust for a local branch of the Salvation Army is held invalid for want of an ascertained beneficiary unless the society becomes incorporated. (Minn.) 669.

A bequest in trust for a chapel is held to have failed altogether, and not to be, under the cy pres doctrine, applicable to general parish purposes when the purpose of the testatrix fails because the people have become too few and too poor to support the chapel. (Mass.) 629.

Liens.

The fact that the materials in a building were furnished under a contract made outside the state is held insufficient to prevent a lien therefor under a statute providing for a lien in favor of any person who has furnished materials for a building in the state. (N. Y.) 410.

The sale of a narrow strip from the front of property for the sole purpose of avoiding a street improvement assessment for which the city has made a contract, but before the lien of the assessment attaches, is held void as against such assessment. (Iowa) 480.

Judgment; priority.

A mortgage for an antecedent consideration filed the same day and a little before the entry of a judgment is held to have no priority, but to stand on a footing of equality with the judgment. (Wash.) 257.

The statutory provision that a judgment shall be a lien from the first day of the term is held to give it priority over a mortgage made during the term and before the judgment. (Neb.) 243.

Will.

Proof of a lost will by declarations of the testator is held insufficient, and testimony of a witness as to such contents, if based entirely on the reading of the will to him by the testator, amounts only to evidence of such declarations. (Neb.) 433.

A will executed jointly by husband and wife, although it cannot be probated as their joint will while one of them is living, is held entitled to probate as the will of the husband during the wife's life, subject to be again probated as her will upon her subsequent death. (N. C.) 339.

VIII. CIVIL REMEDIES.

Comity.

The right to maintain an action in a Federal court between citizens of different states for negligence occurring in Mexico is sustained against objections growing out of the dissimilarity between the laws of Mexico and of the state in which the action is brought. (C. C. App. 5th C.) 387.

Transitory action.

An action by a mortgagor for wrongful sale of the premises by the mortgagee under a power in the mortgage when there had been no default is held to be transitory, and to entitle him to full damages if he elects to affirm the sale, even if the sale is void and he might redeem the premises. (Mass.) 145.

Action for mistake in telegram.

A banker cashing a draft on the faith of a telegram is held to have no right of action against the telegraph company for a mistake in the amount where the message was not sent to him and the banker owed him no duty. (C. C. App. 8th C.) 634.

Process.

Service on the insurance commissioner of process against a foreign insurance company is held to give no jurisdiction where he has not been appointed by the company as required by statute, although it was doing business in the state, if these facts appear on plaintiff's own showing and the company has not appeared to contest the jurisdiction, and is not shown to have received any notice, either actual or constructive. (R. I.) 546.

Service on a nonresident joint stock association engaged in the business of a common carrier is held to be properly made upon a local agent where it appears that there is no officer or superior agent in the state. (Minn.) 225.

An attorney while going to his own county from the supreme court is held exempt from service of process. (Mich.) 663.

Injunction.

An injunction against the diversion of water from a mill dam is allowed notwithstanding the fact that the injury from the diversion would be trivial compared with that which may be suffered by those who are restrained from making it. (Mich.) 355.

Mandatory injunction.

A mandatory injunction to compel the specific performance of a railroad lease by requiring the operation of the road by the lessee is granted against the contention that the lease was too indefinite to be enforced, and that it was a continuing contract requiring the exercise of skill and supervision. (Ky.) 800.

Mandamus.

Mandamus to compel a township trustee to meet with others who have met and because they could not get a quorum have adjourned from day to day can be granted when the law requires the trustees to meet at that time to appoint a county superintendent. (Ind.) 839.

Payment into court.

Taking from the court money paid in as full payment is held to amount to a discharge of the obligation, although the plaintiff takes it protesting that more is due, if the defendant does not waive the condition on which he paid it into court, and no rule of court is made modifying the conditions. (Tenn.) 549.

Mortgagee's liability in receivership.

A novel question in the law of receiverships is that of the liability of a railroad mortgagee who obtains the appointment of a receiver on foreclosure for the wages of the receiver's employees when the trust fund is insufficient to pay them. The court holds that there is no such liability unless it is imposed by the court as a condition of appointing or continuing the receiver. (Or.) 424.

Property subject to creditors.

A perpetual scholarship in a college, granted in consideration of a donation thereto and entitling the donor to keep one pupil in the college free of charge, is held not to be such property as can be taken by his creditors. (Tenn.) 753.

Time.

Including Sunday preceding a term of court which begins on Monday in the computation of the twenty days for which an action must be filed in order to be triable at the term is held correct,—especially where this is in accordance with the long practice of the court, since nothing is to be done on that day. (Ga.) 749.

Damages.

The right to recover damages for fright or nervous shock is denied in an action for negligence, even if physical injuries result therefrom, if these result solely from the mental disturbance. (Mass.) 512.

The owner of land left in a cul de sac by vacating another portion of the street on which it abuts is held to be within a statute giving damages for injuries to land caused by vacating a street. (Pa.) 375.

Presumption.

A presumption of negligence from the escape of electricity from a street railway, causing shock to a horse in the street, is held to be a proper application of the maxim Res ipsa loquitur. (N. J.) 637.

Opinions of witnesses.

On a question of sanity or insanity, nonexperts are held competent to testify, where they show sufficient reasons for the foundation of their opinions. (Ga.) 721.

Unanimous decision.

A unanimous decision to appeal, from which leave is necessary, is held to be made when one of the judges is absent, but the remaining four, who constitute a quorum, all agree. (N. Y.) 615.

IX. CRIMINAL LAW AND PRACTICE.

Jurisdiction.

A statute attempting to give police courts jurisdiction of offenses where the fine does not exceed $200 and the term of imprisonment does not exceed one year is held unconstitutional because it denies the right to a jury except on appeal, and also the right to an information before prosecution. (N. H.) 228.

Fraudulent banking.

A banker who fails to repudiate the act of his son in receiving a deposit after the insolvency of the bank is known, and who does not return the money but makes an assignment, including that money among the assets, within four days, is held guilty of receiving the deposit in violation of statute. (Iowa) 485.

Betting.

Putting up a sum of money as a forfeit on an agreement to put up within a certain time a larger sum equal to that which the other party has put up is held not to constitute a bet. (Tex.) 719.

Sending money to another state to be wagered on a horse race in a third state is held punishable by the state from which it is sent, although such wagers were lawful in the state where the wager was made. (Va.) 640.

Insane convict.

The right of a convict to have a jury trial on an issue of insanity which is alleged to have supervened after conviction is denied, and is 88 L. R. A.

held not to be necessary to due process of law. (Ga.) 577.

Contempt.

Newspaper articles charging a judge, who is a candidate for re-election, with corruption and partiality in actions already ended, are held to be beyond the power of the judge to punish as a criminal contempt, and an affidavit alleging their truth, filed in response to an order to show cause, does not constitute a contempt if the original publication did not. (Wis.) 554.

Pardon.

The forfeiture of a bail bond is held to be unaffected by a subsequent pardon. (Ky.) 808.

Extradition.

The waiver of requisition papers by a fugitive, and his submission to arrest upon a warrant, are held to be a voluntary return into the jurisdiction which authorizes his prosecution for any other crime than that named in the warrant. (Kan.) 756.

The right of the governor to revoke his warrant for the surrender of a fugitive from justice at any time before his removal from the state is sustained, and the power of the court to inquire into the cause of such revocation is denied. (Minn.) 224.

1. Payments indorsed on the back of a note before its transfer by the payee do not destroy its negotiability. Farmers' Bank v. Shippey (Pa.) 823

2. A note is not subjected to equities in the hands of a holder for value by the fact that it is payable to a person, "trustee," if inquiry would have disclosed the fact that the word was merely descriptive, and that the note was made to him for the purpose of enabling him to turn it over in consummation of a subscription to the stock of a syndicate, which was accomplished by his indorsement and transfer. Tradesmen's Nat. Bank v. Looney (Tenn.) 887

3. The liability of the indorser of a note is not affected by the addition of the word "trustee" to his name. Id.

4. The drawer of a draft which is lost in course of transmission through the mails from the payee to his correspondent in another city where the drawee is located is relieved from liability, where the payee fails to present the draft or to discover the loss for nearly six months, although the fact of the loss appeared by report from the correspondent showing that the draft had never been received. Bank of Gilby v. Farnsworth (N. D.) 843

5. A duplicate draft given by the drawer of one which has been lost does not, as a matter of law, import a promise to pay the draft or waive a defense to liability thereon, where it was done to accommodate the payee and enable him to collect the money from the drawee. Id.

6. A drawer's promise to pay a draft, or his recognition of liability thereon, with full knowledge of the facts releasing him from liability, is a waiver of his right to insist that he has been released by failure to take the necessary steps to charge him. Id.

7. Notice to the indorsee that an indorser has no interest in the transaction will not relieve the indorser from liability on the note. Tradesmen's Nat. Bank v. Looney (Tenn.) 887

8. The liability of the maker of a note to an indorsee is not affected by a compromise of a suit by the indorsee against the indorser by which the latter is permitted to substitute securities in lieu of his liability as indorser, under the express agreement that the liability of the maker shall not be affected, and that when any money is collected from the maker it shall be applied to release the securities so deposited. Id.

9. A purchase for value in due course of trade, of a note, is made by a bank which discounts it and applies the proceeds to the payment of a prior note due by the indorser and an overdraft in a bank in which the indorser is interested. Id.

10. Enforcement of a note given as a subscription to the stock of a syndicate organized to purchase the property of a corporation, and which is used to pay for such property, cannot be defeated for fraudulent overvaluation of the property purchased, if the parties making the representation were representatives of the syndicate, and not of the vendor corporation. Id.

11. The rights of the owner of a patent under laws of the United States are not infringed by a state statute applicable to the sale of patent rights requiring the words "peddler's note" to be written across the face of all notes executed for articles sold by a peddler or itinerant person. *Union Nat. Of passengers.

1. A railroad employee engaged in working upon a bridge is a passenger while riding on a railroad train to his home after his day's work is done, where his contract entitles him to free transportation and he is not under any obligation to ride, or engaged in any service for the company while so riding. McNulty v. Pennsylvania R. Co. (Pa.) 376

2. The relation of carrier and passenger exists between a railroad company and a passenger on a train which is temporarily stopped by a burning tank of oil on the track, during which time passengers on the train are taken to a place some distance from the tank, while 38 L. R. A.

waiting for a train to receive them on the other side of the obstruction. Conroy v. Chicago, St. P. M. & O. R. Co. (Wis.) 419

3. A person taking passage on a railroad with a child in his charge of sufficient age to require payment of fare becomes liable for the payment of the child's fare, and upon refusal to pay the same both may be ejected from the train at the next station. Lake Shore & M. S. R. Co. v. Orndorff (Ohio) 140

4. In ejecting a person who has paid fare or presented a ticket, taken up, for failure to pay the fare of a child in his charge, the conductor must first return or offer to return the unused value of such ticket or fare over and above the fares of both for the distance already traveled; but if the ticket is such that a stop-over may be had thereon the conductor may tender a stop-over check instead of money. Id.

5. A railroad company cannot enforce a contract between a messenger and an express company, that the railroad company will not be held liable for accidental injuries to the messenger, of the making of which the railroad company has no knowledge. Louisville, N. A. & O. R. Co. v. Keefer (Ind.) 93

6. A contract by an express company authorized by a messenger in its employ, that, in consideration that the express company be permitted to do business on a railroad, the railroad company will be exempted from all liability for injuries to the messenger, is binding on the messenger, since the railroad company in making it acts, not as a public, but as a private, carrier. Id.

7. The lawfulness of the act of a passenger on an excursion boat in using his gun with a loaded shell will not excuse the owners of the boat from liability for an injury resulting in such passenger's negligence or lack of caution, provided his action is such as to excite apprehension in a reasonably prudent person. West Memphis Packet Co. v. White (Tenn.) 427

8. The owner of a steamboat is required to exercise the utmost vigilance and diligence in protecting its passengers from injuries by the negligent and careless use of a loaded gun exhibited by another passenger where under all the circumstances such owner or his officers and agents might reasonably expect or anticipate the injury. Id.

9. A railway company is required to exercise only ordinary care and prudence towards a passenger who is temporarily prevented from continuing his journey by a burning tank of oil on the track, while he is waiting for a train to come from the other side of the tank to receive him. Conroy v. Chicago, St. P. M. & O. R. Co. (Wis.) 419

10. A railroad company is not required to restrain by physical force a passenger on a railway train which is temporarily stopped by a burning tank of oil on the track, from unnecessarily exposing himself to danger from an explosion of the tank by approaching too close to it. Id.

11. A burning tank of oil on a railroad track, the flames from which ascend several feet into the air, is sufficient notice of the danger of an explosion to a passenger on a train temporarily stopped by the fire, to render unnecessary any caution to him from the company not to approach too near the tank. Id.

12. A passenger on a railway train which is stopped for some time by tanks of burning oil upon the track, who from motives of curiosity and pleasure leaves a place fixed as a temporary station at a safe distance from the burning oil, and goes within 85 feet of the same and remains there for several minutes, is guilty of such contributory negligence as will prevent recovery for injuries caused by an explosion of a tank by which burning oil is thrown upon him. Id.

13. Jumping from an electric car moving at the rate of from 4 to 5 miles an hour is contributory negligence as matter of law. Jagger v. People's Street R. Co. (Pa.) 786

Of goods.

14. Exemptions in favor of a common carrier in bills of lading are to be strictly construed against the carrier, and any doubt or ambiguity therein is to be resolved in favor of the shipper. N. K. Fairbank & Co. v. Cincinnati, N. O. & T. P. R. Co. (C. C. App. 6th C.) 271

15. General and comprehensive words of exemption following an enumeration of particular dangers or risks in a bill of lading are to be construed to embrace only particular occurrences ejusdem generis with those enumerated, unless there is a clear intent to the contrary. Id.

16. Those devices and parts of a car which have no physical operation and connection with the locomotive, except by means of the cars of the train and the couplers between them, such as the axles of the car, are not within the term "machinery" in the phrase "accidents to boilers and machinery," as used in the exemption clause in a bill of lading, evidently intended to apply either to water or rail transportation. Id.

17. A railroad company is not liable for delivery to the consignee, to whom goods are billed, without notice to it that the bill of lading has been forwarded to a bank with a draft attached for collection, although the bill of lading is not produced. Nebraska Meat Mills v. St. Louis N. W. R. Co. (Ark.) 358

18. The right of a carrier to deliver to the consignee is not affected by the Arkansas statute declaring bills of lading negotiable, and that any person to whom the same are transferred shall be held the owner so far as to give validity to any pledge, lien, or transfer upon the faith thereof, and that no property specified therein shall be delivered except on the surrender and cancelation of the bill of lading,—except in cases where the bill of lading has been transferred. Id.

1. An institution which is educational to some extent may be also a charitable institution within the meaning and intent of the Constitution and statutes respecting charitable institutions. People, New York Inst. for the Blind, v. Fitch (N. Y.) 591

2. The fact that an institution is subject to the visitation of the superintendent of public instruction is not conclusive against regarding it as a charitable institution subject to the visitation of a board of charities. Id.

3. An incorporated institution for the blind, which has been supported and its property purchased and maintained mainly by appropriations from the state, although it may be only an educational institution so far as it educates paying pupils, is to be regarded, so far as it clothes, educates, and maintains indigent pupils at public expense or by donations from individuals, as a charitable institution subject to the visitation and the rules of the board of charities, under N. Y. Laws 1895, chap. 771, and also to the restriction under N. Y. Const. art. 8, § 14, against payments by municipalities for any inmate not received and retained pursuant to rules established by the state board of charities. Id.

4. A devise of property to be used in aiding the cause of home and foreign missions, made to an incorporated church which is authorized to acquire property for such purposes, is not a devise in trust for which there must be an ascertained beneficiary, but is an absolute gift to the church. Lans v. Eaton (Minn.) 669

5. Incorporation within a reasonable time may make a local branch of the Salvation Army competent to become the beneficiary of a charitable trust by virtue of Minn. Gen. Stat. § 8048, providing that on the incorporation of a religious society any estate devised in trust for it shall vest in the corporation as fully as if it had been legally incorporated from the date of its religious organization. Id.

6. An unincorporated, voluntary association constituting a branch of the Salvation Army cannot be the beneficiary of a trust under Minn. Gen. Stat. 1894, chap. 43, requiring the beneficiary to be certain, or capable of being rendered certain. Id.

7. A bequest in trust to purchase a lot and build a chapel to be used forever for public worship under the auspices of the Roman Catholic church is for a public charitable use. Teale v. Bishop of Derry (Mass.) 629

8. The failure of the purpose of the testatrix in a bequest for the building of a chapel in her native place, which results because the people there are diminishing in number and are too poor to support the chapel, will not justify a diversion of the fund by the cy pres doctrine to the repair of a neighboring parish church, or for a parish house, or the enlargement of a parish graveyard or otherwise for the general benefit of the parish, but the bequest must be held to have failed. Id.

CONFLICT OF LAWS. See also RECEIVERS, 4.

1. A statute providing that an association or partnership can be sued in its company name has no extraterritorial force or effect. Edwards v. Warren Linoline & G. (Mass.) 791

2. A transfer of stock in a national bank of another state, made in Maryland to a married woman, who is competent by the law of that state to be a stockholder, is valid irrespective of the law of the state in which the bank is situated. Kerr v. Urie (Md.) 119

3. A marriage contracted in another state by a resident of Oregon, who has been divorced in that state by a decree from which there is yet time to take an appeal, is absolutely void under 1 Hill's (Or.) Ann. Laws, § 503, providing that a divorce decree shall terminate the marriage "except that neither party shall be capable of contracting marriage with a third person" until the expiration of the period allowed for an appeal. McLennan v. McLennan (Or.) 863

4. That a contract for materials to be delivered "at and for" a building in New York was made and payable in another state does not prevent the materialman from obtaining a lien therefor, under N. Y. Laws 1885, chap. 342, providing that "any person" may have a lien who has furnished any materials which have been used in the erection of any building within the state. Campbell v. Coon (N. Y.) 410

Action for negligence.

5. The laws of Mexico defining negligence, and the civil rights resulting therefrom, are not too vague and indefinite to be administered by courts in this country. Every v. Mexican C. R. Co. (C. C. App. 5th C.) 387

6. Dissimilarity between the law of Mexico, where the cause of action for negligence arose, and the law of Texas, in which an action is brought therefor, will not preclude the maintenance of the action, where the dissimilarity relates chiefly to matters of procedure, and does not involve any conflict with the settled public policy of Texas. Id.

7. The provision of the law of Mexico giving extraordinary indemnity for negligence considering the social position of the party injured does not constitute any reason why a court in this country should not entertain an action for negligence occurring in Mexico, when it is not asked to give such extraordinary indemnity. Id.

8. The fact that negligence may constitute a crime in Mexico does not make a civil action in this country for the negligence amount to the enforcement of a penal law of Mexico, when the civil liability does not depend, under Mexican law, upon the criminal prosecution. Id.

9. The requirement of an endeavor to procure an agreement and a compromise, which is found in the Mexican Code, art. 313, relates merely to procedure, and failure to comply therewith does not prevent an action in this country for negligence occurring in Mexico. Id.

10. The right, under the law of Mexico, to recover additional damages in a new suit, when they accrue after the first judgment for injuries caused by negligence, is a matter of remedy only, and does not prevent a court in the United States from enforcing a liability for negligence occurring in Mexico. Id.

1. The New York Constitution of 1777, being adopted before the Constitution of the United States had been adopted, is a result of all the legislative power that the people of the state could exert untrammelled by any higher law. Sage v. New York (N. Y.) 606

2. Debates of a constitutional convention, although they may, for some purposes, but in a limited degree, be consulted in interpreting a doubtful phrase or provision of the Constitution, are as a rule deemed an unsafe guide. Rasmussen v. Baker (Wyo.) 773

3. The act of Congress admitting Utah as a state by accepting and ratifying the state Constitution invested all its provisions with all authority conferred by any act of Congress, even if the power given to provide for the transfer of causes pending in the territorial courts to the state and Federal courts was an invalid delegation of the power of Congress. McCornick v. Western U. Teleg. Co. (C. C. App. 8th C.) 684

Delegation of power.

4. An attempt to confer judicial authority on the county recorder in violation of Ohio Const. art. 4, § 1, is made by Ohio act April 27, 1896, for the registration of land titles, by giving him authority to determine the fact that a mortgage has been discharged or that a lien has become inoperative, and to enter those facts on the records, and also to correct memorials made or issued by mistake if the rights of bona fide purchasers or lien holders have not intervened. State, Monnett, v. Guilbert (Ohio) 519

5. Legislative powers are not delegated to the judiciary by Minn. Gen. Stat. 1894, § 5979, providing that the court or judge allowing a writ of mandamus shall direct the manner of serving the same. State, Railroad & W. Co., v. Adams Exp. Co. (Minn.) 225

6. The provision of the Minnesota Constitution forbidding the delegation of the legislative powers to the judiciary is not violated by the provision of Minn. Gen. Stat. 1894, § 399, that the courts may direct the manner in which notice may be given to a common carrier of a hearing of an accusation that it refuses or neglects to obey any lawful order of the railroad and warehouse commission. Id.

7. The power given by the act of Congress to the constitutional convention of Utah to provide for the transfer of actions pending in the territorial courts to the state or Federal courts is not an invalid delegation of the power of Congress, as Congress has power to create local legislative bodies and invest them with legislative powers. *McCornick v. Equality.

8. A statute forbidding the citizens of any other county from fishing in the waters of two specified counties without a license, without anything to forbid the citizens of those counties from fishing in other counties without a license, violates the constitutional guaranty of the equal protection of the laws. State v. Higgins (S. C.) 561

9. The exemption from a statute to license and regulate hawkers and peddlers, manufacturers, mechanics, nurserymen, farmers, and butchers, who sell their own manufactures or the products of their own nurseries or farms, makes an arbitrary distinction between the peddling by those persons and by a purchaser from them, and is therefore in violation of Minn. Const. art. 4, §§ 33, 34, prohibiting partial class legislation. State, Luria, v. Wagener (Minn.) 677

10. An insurance company is not denied the equal protection of the laws by a statute which in effect limits the liability of a railroad company for fires to the difference between the amount of loss and the amount of insurance on the property destroyed, thus depriving the insurer of the benefit of subrogation. Leavitt v. Canadian P. R. Co. (Me.) 152

Due process of law.

11. A statute authorizing administration upon the estate of a person who has left home and not been heard from for seven years is unconstitutional, since the administration upon the estate of a living person deprives him of property contrary to the law of the land or without due process of law. Carr v. Brown (R. I.) 294

12. The remedy by due course of law guaranteed by § 16 of the Ohio Bill of Rights extends to all the adversary rights of persons in property, and requires, before judicially determining such right, that jurisdiction of the person shall be obtained by process issued and served, although substituted or constructive service may be provided by the legislature when actual service is impracticable. State, Monnett, v. Guilbert (Ohio) 519

13. The determination against adverse claimants of real estate under Ohio act April 27, 1896, for the registration of land titles, made without any issuance and service of summons upon them, and without any notice except by one published in a newspaper "To whom it may concern," is in violation of the constitutional guaranty of due course of law. Id.

14. The refusal by a judge of the superior court at the time when judgment is to be entered or after it has been entered in a capital case, to allow or order a judicial investigation concerning the mental condition of the accused, either with or without the aid of a jury, is not a denial of due process of law, as the provisions of Ga. Pen. Code, § 1047, relating to inquisitions in such matters, are sufficiently comprehensive to cover all cases of alleged insanity beginning after the rendition of the verdict. Baughn v. State (Ga.) 577

15. The provision of Minn. Gen. Laws 1894, § 399, authorizing the courts to direct the manner in which service shall be made on 88 L. R. A.

the agents or servants of a common carrier of a notice of a hearing of an accusation that it refuses or neglects to obey a lawful order of the railroad and warehouse commission, is not objectionable as an attempt to obtain jurisdiction over the carrier without due process of law. State, Railroad & W. Com., v. Adams Exp. Co. (Minn.) 225

16. Notice to the owner or occupant of premises before the passage of an ordinance by a board of aldermen, under authority of statute, requiring a privy vault to be filled up and destroyed, is not necessary to constitute due process of law, since his day in court can be had when sued for a penalty under the ordinance, or by bringing an action for damages if the authorities fill up and destroy the vault. Harrington v. Providence (R. I.) 305

Police regulation.

17. A statute requiring railroads and transportation companies to turn over to a storage company or public warehouseman all property which the consignees fail to call for or receive within twenty days after notice of its arrival (Minn. Gen. Laws 1895, chap. 149, § 11), is unconstitutional and void, not being a lawful exercise of the police power of the state. State v. Chicago, M. & St. P. E. Co. (Minn.) 672

18. A city ordinance providing that no persons shall establish or conduct any steam shoddy machine or steam carpet-beating machine within 100 feet of any church, school-house, or dwelling-house, is valid under Cal. State* (Ga.) 721

2. A continuance of a trial for murder, in which the defense of insanity is set up, should be granted for the absence of witnesses by whom defendant expects to prove his insanity, where they have been acquainted with him all his life, and one of them is a physician who is familiar with the nature of the disease which is claimed to have caused the insanity; and others are defendant's brothers, although there are other witnesses, including near relatives, by whom many of the facts could be proved, and although the absent witnesses had not actually seen defendant for some time before the homicide. Id.

1. A contract of a foreign corporation, if not contrary to public policy, is not invalid because the corporation has not complied with R. I. Gen. Laws, chap. 253, §§ 36-41, requiring it to appoint a resident of the state as its attorney but not declaring that such contract shall be void, while another statute expressly provides that in case of a foreign insurance company the contract shall be valid. Garratt Ford Co. v. Vermont Mfg. Co. (R. I.) 545

2. The illegality of a transfer of stock to the president of a corporation for the purpose of having it used to corrupt government officials for the benefit of the corporation will not prevent the owner from recovering the stock by action, if it has not been used for the illegal purpose, but has been taken by the transferee for his own use. Wassermann v. Sloss (Cal.) 176

3. An abandonment of effort to obtain a codicil to a will cannot constitute a valuable consideration for the assignment of an expected interest in the estate, as it is against public policy to recognize such importunity as the legitimate basis of a contract right. Re Lennig's Estate (Pa.) 878

4. Public policy does not require the avoidance of a contract by an employee not to disclose secrets which must necessarily be imparted to him by his employer to enable him to do his work. O. & W. Thum Co. v. Tloczynski (Mich.) 200

5. Insurance of a carrier of passengers against liability for injuries to them is not contrary to public policy. Boston & A. R. Co. v. Mercantile Trust & D. Co. (Md.) 87

6. A contract by a railroad employee which gives him his election, after an injury, to take the benefits of a relief fund to which he as well as the railroad company has contributed, or to sue for damages in a court of law, and providing that his acceptance of such benefits will release the employer from liability, —is not contrary to public policy. Eckman v. Chicago, B. & Q. R. Co. (Ill.) 750

Performance; breach.

7. An architect's certificate that a building has been actually completed, provided for in the building contract, need not be obtained by one who furnished materials to the contractor, where the latter abandons the work and the owner finishes the same in accordance with a provision of the contract. Campbell v. Coon (N. Y.) 410

8. The repudiation of a contract before the time for performance arrives does not constitute a breach thereof, but the only effect is to dispense with an offer by the other party to perform, if such repudiation is not withdrawn before the stipulated time for performance. Stanford v. Magill (N. D.) 760

9. The mere making of a second executory contract to sell property which the vendor had already agreed to sell is not of itself a breach of the prior agreement, as it does not incapacitate him from carrying it out. Id.

10. The vendor in a contract to sell property of a certain description, no particular articles being agreed upon, can, before the day of delivery, after an ex parte selection of the property which he intends to deliver, sell that property to another without breach of his agreement, as the law requires only that he deliver property of the prescribed description when delivery is due. Id.

11. A party having an option to deliver property under a contract at any time between certain dates, if he intends to treat the time of performance as having arrived and therefore to hold a repudiation of the agreement by the vendee before the last day of performance has arrived as a breach thereof, must give notice to the vendee of his exercise of his option for an earlier delivery; but he need not offer to perform, as that is waived by the vendee's refusal to perform. Id.

Impairing obligation.

12. The vested rights of owners abutting upon a public park dedicated with the restriction that no buildings shall be erected upon it, fixed by the acts of dedication, the acceptance of the city, and the acquiescence of the public and abutting owners, cannot be changed by the legislature granting the city the right to convey such land for railroad purposes, as such action would be an unconstitutional impairment of such rights. Chicago v. Ward (Ill.) 849

13. The obligation of a contract of fire insurance made at a time when a railroad company was by statute liable for fires communicated by its engines is not impaired by a subsequent amendment of the statute restricting the liability of the railroad company in effect to the difference between the loss and the amount of insurance on the property, as the parties to that contract cannot limit the right of the legislature to change the statutory liability. Leavitt v. Canadian P. R. Co. (Me.) 152

1. A water company entering upon the business of furnishing a public water supply under a constitution giving a tribunal the right to fix water rates is bound to submit to the conditions thereby imposed. San Diego Water Co. v. San Diego (Cal.) 460

2. A bequest to an incorporated charitable institution, of property in excess of the amount which such corporations are allowed by general statute to take and hold, if it is not prohibited by the statute of wills or by the charter of the corporation or by the law which authorized its organization, and there is no penalty for taking in excess of the limitation, is not void, but merely voidable, and can be avoided by the state alone. Farrington v. Putnam (Me.) 389

3. The private rights or interests of a dealer in plumbers' supplies are injured or put in hazard by proceedings of an incorporated plumbers' supply association which is not engaged in the trade and with which he has no dealings nor any relation by which its legitimate interests are affected by the question whether he shall have credit in the market, when it officiously and without right assumes to notify sellers of such goods that he has not paid his accounts, and to debar a considerable number of dealers from selling to him upon credit. Hartnett v. Plumbers' Supply Assn. (Mass.) 194

4. Proceedings to compel persons to pay demands of members of a plumbers' association by threatening to expose their alleged delinquencies and inform certain dealers that they owed overdue accounts, and thereby prevent them from obtaining credit in the business which they are carrying on, are not germane to the purpose declared by a plumbers' supply association "of promoting pleasant relations among its members," or "of establishing and maintaining a place for social meetings," or of "discussing, arbitrating, and settling all matters pertaining to the prosperity and promotion of the jobbing plumbers' supply business." Id.

Stock and stockholders.

5. A contract to offer stock to the corporation at the lowest price at which the holder is willing to sell, before offering it to any other purchaser, is not binding in favor of the corporation when it was made by proposed stockholders before the corporation was in existence as a legal entity. Ireland v. Globe Milling & R. Co. (R. I.) 299

6. A corporation cannot enforce a contract between proposed incorporators to the effect that they will not transfer their stock without giving the option of purchase to the corporation; but the remedy, if any, for breach of the contract, would be a personal one against the offending stockholder. Id.

7. The mere issue of certificates of stock by a corporation does not amount to a ratification by it of a contract made before it came into existence between the proposed incorporators to the effect that they would not transfer their shares without giving the company an option to purchase them. Id.

8. A resolution of the members of a corporation for the increase of its capital stock is a sufficient by-law for that purpose. Peck v. Elliott (C. C. App. 6th C.) 616

9. An increase of the capital of a corporation by an amendment of a by-law is valid when by the constitution of the corporation it is given power to fix the amount of capital by by-law. Id.

10. The rule against an implied power of a corporation to increase the amount of its capital when that is definitely fixed by the charter or statutory articles of incorporation has no application where the power to determine upon the capital to be engaged is made one of the matters for internal regulation by by-law. Id.

11. A transfer of a patent right to a corporation in partial payment of a subscription to stock as a mere device for evading a condition that the stock must be taken at par, followed by a retransfer to the subscriber at a nominal consideration, is insufficient to relieve him from liability to pay for the stock at its par value. Id.

12. A mortgage by a corporation to secure money advanced to it in good faith cannot be reduced in favor of liens of subsequent creditors, because, at the time of, and as an inducement to, the advance, the mortgagees received stock of the corporation as a bonus. Dummer v. Smedley (Mich.) 490

13. Existing creditors of a corporation cannot impeach a transaction by which the corporate stock is increased and issued as a bonus to third persons to induce them to advance money to the corporation on mortgage security, so as to avoid the mortgage and treat the advance as a payment for stock. Id.

14. One who holds stock as the self-appointed attorney or trustee of an infant, without anything on the books of the corporation to show that the holder is not the actual and beneficial owner, is liable as a stockholder. Kerr v. Urie (Md.) 119

15. The failure of a corporation to pay a tax required on the increase of its capital stock cannot be set up by a subscriber to such stock as a defense against his liability, when he has become president of the corporation by virtue of that stock alone. Peck v. Elliott (C. C. App. 6th C.) 618

16. A proceeding under the statute for an execution for unpaid subscriptions to corporate stock cannot be maintained after the appointment of a receiver for the purpose of collecting the assets of the corporation. Rouse. H. & Co. v. Detroit Cycle Co. (Mich.) 794

17. A receiver appointed in an action for the sequestration of the assets of an insolvent corporation, under the provisions of Minn. Gen. Stat. 1894, chap. 76, has no authority, except in cases where it is otherwise provided by statute, to enforce the individual liability of the stockholders for the debts of the corporation. Minneapolis Baseball Co. v. City Bank (Minn.) 415

Dissolution; disposition of property.

18. A court of equity cannot dissolve or wind up the affairs and sequester the property of a corporation without express statutory authority. Wallace v. Pierce-Wallace Pub. Co. (Iowa) 122

19. The exercise by a private corporation of franchises or privileges not conferred by law may be a serious usurpation and encroachment which, when it injures or puts in hazard the private rights of any person, will justify the exercise by the court of the powers given by Mass. Pub. Stat. chap. 186, §§ 17-25, on an information in the nature of a quo warranto. Hartnett v. Plumbers' Supply Assn. (Mass.) 194

20. A conveyance in fee to a corporation which has a limited existence is not limited to the life of the corporation, and does not give the grantor a resulting trust which will take effect when the corporation ceases to exist. Wilson v. Leary (N. C.) 240

21. A person employed at a salary of $100 per month by a mowing machine company to go from place to place and fix and set up machines and unpack and repack them when necessary, as well as to sell or solicit sales, is an employee within the meaning of N. Y. Laws 1885, chap. 876, giving a preference to claims of wages of "employees, operatives, and laborers" of corporations. Palmer v. Van Santvoord (N. Y.) 402

22. A preference of claims of clerks, servants, and employees of an insolvent corporation, does not extend to a trust fund devoted to a special purpose, as in case of a deposit for the benefit of policy holders of an insurance company. Boston & A. R. Co. v. Mercantile Trust & D. Co. (Md.) 97

23. An insurance adjuster, or a person rendering services of a higher degree than a clerk, is not included among the "clerks, servants, and employees" of an insurance company, to whom the statutes give a preference in distribution of the company's assets when it is insolvent. Id.

COUNTIES.

COURTS. See also CONSTITUTIONAL LAW, 5, 6, 15; CONTEMPT, 1; CRIMINAL LAW, 2; STATUTES, 8.

1. A statute which attempts to deprive the governor of his constitutional power to appoint judges of an inferior court, by changing the name of the court and requiring the judge to be elected, without changing its jurisdiction or functions, is void. Johnson v. State (N. J. Err. & App.) 373

2. When four of the five judges composing a court are declared by the Constitution to be a quorum, their agreement in a decision, the other being absent, makes the decision unanimous within the meaning of a statute requiring leave to appeal from unanimous decisions. Harroun v. Brush Electric Light Co. (N. Y.) 615

3. The question of international comity is controlled and decided by international law and custom, and the decisions of local courts thereon are not controlling in the courts of the United States. Evey v. Mexican C. R. Co. (C. C. App. 5th C.) 887

4. The fact that an action might be brought in Mexico for injuries received there by a railroad employee who lives in Texas, since the defendant owns and operates a railroad in Mexico, does not constitute a reason why he should not sue in Texas,—at least when the defendant railway company is incorporated in the United States and its road extends into Texas. Id.

5. A transitory action for a personal tort, accruing in Mexico, is within the jurisdiction of a circuit court of the United States, where one party is a citizen and resident of Texas and the other a citizen of Massachusetts. Id.

6. The fixing of rates by legislative power or otherwise than by appropriate judicial proceedings in which full notice and opportunity to appear and defend are given is reviewable by the courts,—at least to the extent of ascertaining whether such rates will furnish some reward for the property used and services furnished. San Diego Water Co. v. San Diego (Cal.) 460

7. A review by the court of the action of the common council in fixing water rates is not limited to a determination of the question on the same evidence that was produced before the council, where the hearing before the council was conducted without notice to the water company or the rate payers, and without any right on their part to intervene effectually. Id.

8. An ordinance cannot be held invalid because it is unreasonable, when the power to pass ordinances on the subject is conferred by a constitutional statute. [Affirmed by divided court.] Darlington v. Ward (S. C.) 326

9. A court will not interfere with the internal management of a foreign corporation at the suit of a resident stockholder, by setting aside unwise and useless contracts which depreciate and destroy the value of the stock, although the visible, tangible property of the corporation, consisting of conduits in streets for electric lighting, is within the state. Madden v. Penn Electric Light Co. (Pa.) 638

10. The legal character of the liability of a stockholder does not prevent its enforcement by receivers in a proceeding which is wholly ancillary to the original receivership suit in equity. Peck v. Elliott (C. C. App. 6th C.) 616

11. A proceeding by receivers of a corporation to enforce the liability of a stockholder is ancillary to the receivership suit, and the jurisdiction thereof depends upon the jurisdiction in the original case. Id.

2. The attempt to give police courts concurrent jurisdiction with the supreme court in any criminal case where the fine does not exceed $200 and the term of imprisonment does not exceed one year, although the offenses thus punishable were not within the jurisdiction of a justice of the peace in 1784, renders N. H. Laws 1895, chap. 117, unconstitutional, because it impairs the constitutional right of trial by jury, and of a presentment or indictment before prosecution in cases in which such rights existed when the state Constitution was adopted. Id.

DAMAGES. See also FRIGHT.

1. An abortive attempt to sell property as prescribed by N. D. Rev. Code, § 4833, in order to fix the amount of liability of a vendee who has broken his contract, will not preclude the recovery of the damages prescribed by § 4988, subd. 2, and § 5009. Stanford v. Magill (N. D.) 766

3. The measure of damages for a vendee's breach of an executory contract of purchase, when the property has not been resold as prescribed by N. D. Rev. Code, § 4888, is, under § 4988, subd. 2, the excess, if any, of the amount due from the buyer under the contract over the value to the seller, together with the excess, if any, of the expenses of marketing the property over those which would have been incurred in delivering it to the purchaser; while under § 5009 the value to the seller is deemed to be the price which he could have obtained in the market nearest the place where it should have been accepted by the buyer, and at such time after the breach as would have sufficed, with reasonable diligence, for the seller to effect a resale. Id.

3. A verdict for $3,500 for an injury to a laborer who is shot in the finger and through his thumb, and whose right arm is perforated with shot from the shoulder to his hand, many of which are never extracted, and whose right leg also receives several shot by which his capacity for lifting is permanently affected, is not excessive. West Memphis Packet Co. v. White (Tenn.) 487

4. A mortgagor may elect to recover full damages on account of the unlawful sale of the land under a power of sale in the mortgage when there was no default, and thus ratify the title of a purchaser who has bought the land for value in good faith, although he might, instead, repudiate the sale and redeem the premises. *Rogers v. 2. 2. A city acting as trustee of a public park bounded upon a lake by filling in submerged land adjacent thereto as a part of the park is estopped from claiming title to the same free from the park trust, and from restrictions thereof against the erection of buildings upon the park. Id.

3. A city is not estopped from enforcing the forfeiture of a street-railway franchise for nonuser, merely because of its interference with the street railway company's rights in some respects, unless that was such as to justify or excuse the nonoperation of the road. *State, Kansas City, v. 4. An infant of years of discretion by intentional fraudulent conduct will be barred, under the doctrine of estoppel in pais, from asserting title either to real or personal property against one misled thereby. Williams v. Jones (W. Va.) 694

Presumptions and burden of proof.

5. Defendant on trial for murder, who relies on the defense of insanity, must show affirmatively by a preponderance of the evidence introduced at the trial that he was insane when he committed the homicide. Ryder v. State (Ga.) 721

6. A wife who turns remittances from her husband into a business which she carries on in partnership with a third person, and out of which both families are supported, has the burden of proving, as against the husband's creditors, that their rights have not been injured thereby, and that an equivalent sum was properly and actually consumed by the husband's family. Trefethen v. Lynam (Me.) 190

7. The presumption is that a judgment obtained against a husband, and which is claimed to be a lien upon community property, was for a community debt, if there is no proof on the subject. Goetsinger v. Rosenfeld (Wash.) 257

8. It will be presumed that the law requiring payment of a tax on the increase of the capital stock of a corporation has been complied with, when the stock has been increased and there is no evidence that the tax has not been paid. Peck v. Elliott (C. C. App. 6th C.) 616

10. The burden of proving the truth of answers by an applicant for life insurance, which are by the contract made warranties, rests upon the one seeking to recover on the policy, although the burden may be lifted as to matters which only affect the right of action, by the presumption in favor of honesty and against fraud until something appears to rebut it. Sweeney v. Metropolitan L. Ins. Co. (R. I.) 297

11. The escape of electricity from a street railway, to the injury of a horse being driven on a public street, is presumptive proof of negligence in the operation of the railway. Trenton Pass. R. Co. v. Cooper (N. J. Err. & App.) 637

Oral as to writing.

12. Oral evidence that a duplicate draft was given to accommodate the payee in order to enable him to collect the money from the drawee does not contradict or vary the terms of a written contract between the parties, because the contract was made by the original draft and the duplicate adds nothing thereto. Bank of Gilby v. Farnsworth (N. D.) 843

Opinions.

13. Testimony of nonexperts as to the appearance of footprints in the sand near the scene of a crime, and prints made in sand by boots worn by the prisoner, is admissible upon the question of his connection with the crime. Johnson v. State (N. J. Err. & App.) 873

14. Testimony of expert witnesses as to the value of the property of a water company is not admissible, at least in favor of the company, as against the better evidence of its own books on the subject. San Diego Water Co. v. San Diego (Cal.) 460

15. An insurance expert will not be permitted to state whether or not a misrepresented or concealed fact in an application for a life policy would be regarded among insurance companies generally as material. Penn Mut. L. Ins. Co. v. Mechanics' Sav. Bank & T. Co. (C. C. App. 6th C.) 83

16. An insurance expert cannot be permitted to give his opinion that certain undisclosed facts increased the risk of a life policy, but he may state the usage of insurance companies as to rejecting risks when made aware of such facts. Id.

Res gestae.

17. Words spoken by a driver in the effort to control a runaway horse are admissible in evidence as a part of the res gestae, in an action for damages resulting from the frightening of the horse. Trenton Pass. R. Co. v. Cooper (N. J. Err. & App.) 637

Relevancy.

18. Evidence legal for some purposes cannot be excluded because a jury may erroneously use it for another purpose. Id.

19. Evidence of previous experience of a driver in the case of electric shock to a horse is competent to account for his words and conduct in endeavoring to control a horse which had received a shock, but not to prove the fact of the shock. Id.

20. Evidence of the effect of air upon mail sacks thrown from running trains is inadmissible on the question of the effect upon a boy weighing 65 pounds standing near a passing train. Graney v. St. Louis, I. M. & S. R. Co. (Mo.) 633

21. Upon the question of intent in omitting existing policies from the answer to a question in an application as to the amount of other insurance, evidence of similar omissions by the applicant in answer to similar questions by other companies is relevant and competent. Penn. Mut. L. Ins. Co. v. Mechanics' Sav. Bank & T. Co. (C. C. App. 6th C.) 83

Weight and sufficiency.

22. The contents of a lost will cannot be proved solely by the declarations of the testator. Clark v. Turner (Neb.) 433

23. Testimony as to the contents of a lost will by a witness who has never inspected it but has derived knowledge only from the testator's reading it to him is in effect only testimony as to the testator's declarations, and is not sufficient to prove the contents of the lost will. Id.

24. A variance between an averment that plaintiff was an employee of a railroad company, and proof that he was employed by its lessee and injured through the lessor's negligent construction of its road, is immaterial. Lee v. Southern P. R. Co. (Cal.) 71

25. It is the duty of the jury on a trial for murder in which the defense of insanity is set up, to consider the evidence on such defense in connection with the other evidence in the case, although it does not appear from the preponderance of such evidence that defendant was insane at the time of the homicide, and the jury must then, in view of all the evidence, determine whether or not a reasonable doubt of defendant's guilt exists in their minds. *Ryder v. 1. Taking a bond from a railroad company which is about to lay tracks in its streets, to save the city from the results of possible negligence of the company, will not increase the liability of the city in case of such negligence. Terry v. Richmond (Va.) 884

2. The caving of an excavation under a street, through the negligence of the railroad company making it, does not make a city liable for injuries to adjacent buildings, if the company had authority from the state to lay its tracks within the city, and the city had legally granted its permission. Id.

3. Permission to lay tracks under a street is within the power given to a city council to determine and designate the route and grade of any railroad to be laid in the city. Id.

4. Owners of property abutting on that portion of a street which is not vacated, but which is left in a cul de sac by vacating another part of the street, if the market value of the property is lessened thereby, are entitled to damages under Pa. act April 21, 1858, § 6, giving the owner of land injured by the vacation of a street the same right to damages as if it was injured by the opening or widening of a street. Re Melon Street (Pa.) 275

2. A fair association is not liable for injuries to one who is injured by the bolting of a horse from a track where a race is being held, if it has provided a suitable grand stand from which the race could be viewed, and has erected a railing composed of 2 x 4 timber nailed to posts 3½ or 4 feet high, between the

of warranty of answers in an application for insurance, no misrepresentation made in good faith shall defeat the policy unless it is material to the risk, the mere fact of warranty in form will not render every statement of fact material, but the question of materiality is subject to judicial investigation. Penn Mut. L. Ins. Co. v. Mechanics' Sav. Bank & T. Co. (C. C. App. 6th C.) 88

9. False answers in an application for insurance, knowingly made for the purpose of misleading the company, although not material, will avoid the policy under a statute providing that such answers innocently made shall have no effect on the policy. Id.

10. A representation is made in bad faith, within the meaning of a statute providing that it shall not avoid the policy unless made in bad faith, only when it is made with actual intent to mislead, not when it is made through forgetfulness and inadvertence. Id.

11. Materiality of a concealment of other insurance, upon a life risk, cannot be presumed from the fact that such concealment was made by the applicant in applications to other companies. Id.

12. Concealment by an applicant for life insurance, of embezzlements by him which are not inquired about by the insurer, will not, unless fraudulent, avoid the policy, although the fact of embezzlement may be material to the risk. Id.

13. A warranty in an application for life insurance, that no circumstance or information has been withheld touching applicant's past or present state of health and habits of life with which the insurer ought to be acquainted, does not cover a habit of embezzlement as to which the application contains no inquiry. Id.

14. A question as to occupation, in an application for life insurance, does not call for information as to the fact of the applicant being an habitual embezzler. Id.

15. Mere temporary ailments or affections, not of a serious or dangerous character, which pass away and are likely to be forgotten because they leave no trace in the constitution, are not to be regarded as diseases within the meaning of a life insurance policy. Id.

16. Omitting a part of the insurance carried, from an answer to a question in an application as to policies in other companies, with directions to state companies and amount, will render the answer false. Id.

17. An application for a policy of insurance in Minnesota, on property located in Washington, which is delivered by the company on a certain day in the latter state, will be held to have been before a transfer of the property, which took place two days before the policy was delivered, for the purpose of determining the truthfulness of a statement as to the title to the property. Pioneer Sav. & L. Co. v. Providence Washington Ins. Co. (Wash.) 897

18. A conveyance from the mortgagor to mortgagee prior to the date of the fire, which is not accepted until after that date, will not avoid a policy of insurance on the property for change of title, since the mortgagor may keep his mortgage alive and prevent its merging in the title if it is to his interest to do so. Id.

19. Change of title by deed from mortgagor to mortgagee in the interval between the application by the mortgagee for insurance on the property and delivery of the policy will not render the insurance void for false description of the property as belonging to the mortgagor. If the facts of the existence of the mortgage and the pendency of foreclosure proceedings are stated in the application. Id.

20. A violation of the ordinary stipulation in a mortgage clause on an insurance policy, that the mortgagee will notify the insurer of a change of title to the property, is not a ground for forfeiture of the policy, but is merely a breach of contract for which an action for damages will lie if the insurer is injured. Id.

21. Additional insurance taken without the consent of the prior insurer increases the risk as matter of law, so that the provision of Ohio Rev. Stat. § 8643, as to the liability on a policy in the absence of any change increasing the risk without the consent of the insurers, does not apply. Sun Fire Office v. Clark (Ohio) 562

22. A mortgage, although in the form of an absolute deed, does not make any change in the title, interest, or possession of the property of the insured within the meaning of a provision in a policy that it shall be void in case of such change. Id.

Total disability.

23. Total disability within the meaning of an accident policy does not mean absolute physical inability to transact any kind of business pertaining to one's occupation, but it is sufficient if his injuries are such that common care and prudence require him to desist from transacting any such business in order to effect a cure. Lobbill v. Laboring Men's Mut. Aid Assn. (Minn.) 537

24. Ability to perform occasionally some trivial or unimportant act connected with some kind of business pertaining to one's occupation will not render his disability partial instead of total, provided that he is unable to transact substantially, to any material extent, any kind of business pertaining to his occupation. Id.

25. Inability to transact some kinds or branches of business pertaining to one's occupation as a merchant will not constitute total disability to transact "any and every kind of business pertaining to the occupation," if he is able to transact some other kinds or branches of business pertaining thereto. Id.

26. The fact that a merchant goes to his store several times a week when he is down town to see his physician and get shaved, and sits down for a brief time, but takes no part in the business except to hand out a small article to a customer and take change for it on one or two occasions, does not show that he is not wholly disabled from transacting any and every kind of business pertaining to his occupation. Id.

27. The fact that a man goes to his office every day for a short time without doing any work or business there does not show that he is not wholly disabled from prosecuting any and every kind of business pertaining to his occupation, where his business consists in making loans on personal security. Turner v. Fidelity & C. Co. (Mich.) 529

Waiver of provision.

28. A letter from an insurer to a claimant asking that the matter be allowed to rest until the adjuster of the company can see the claimant or his attorney constitutes a waiver of a provision in the policy limiting the time for furnishing proofs of death and beginning an action on the policy. Id.

Delay of action.

29. Delaying action for insurance for more than one year and a half after a letter from the insurer asking that the matter may rest until an adjuster calls is not fatal, although nothing more is heard about the adjuster and the delay continued for nearly a year after the limitation of the time for action, which was waived by the letter, had expired. Id.

Subrogation.

30. The right of recovery against the person causing the loss, which is reserved to the insurer by a clause in a policy, depends upon the law existing at the time of the fire. Leavitt v. Canadian P. R. Co. (Me.) 152

Insolvency of insurer.

31. A special fund for the benefit of policyholders of an insolvent insurance company cannot be charged with any portion of the costs and commissions incurred in administering the general fund, which is totally distinct. Boston & A. R. Co. v. Mercantile Trust & D. Co. (Md.) 97

32. The importance of distributing assets of an insolvent insurance company at an early date prevents postponing the settlement to await the determination of every contingency on which its policy engagements are suspended; and the court may fix a reasonable time within which claims must be filed in order to participate, although this may result in a misfortune to those whose claims are cut off. Id.

33. Policy-holders of an insolvent insurance company have the right to participate with all other creditors in the general fund of the company's assets after they have exhausted a special fund which is held in trust for them alone. Id.

34. A surrender of a trust fund by a state treasurer under order of court, when he held it for the benefit of the policy-holders of an insurance company, does not affect their rights therein. Id.

35. A deposit with a state treasurer of securities as a guaranty for the payment of policies of an insurance company, whether made as a statutory requirement or voluntarily, and whether held by him in his official or in his individual capacity, creates a trust for the benefit of such policy-holders in case of the insolvency of the company, to the exclusion of other claims except a paramount claim for taxes. Id.

36. A loss or injury insured against, which takes place before the insolvency of the insurance company, but the amount of which is not ascertained or paid until after the insolvency, entitles the policy-holder to prove for a sum equal to his loss or damage plus the return premium, if any. Id.

37. Losses which happen after the insolvency of an insurance company are not provable against the funds in the hands of a receiver of the company, although the value of destroyed policies may be proved. Id.

38. On the breach of the contract of an insurance policy by insolvency of the company the policy holder has a claim for the value of the destroyed policy, amounting to the unearned or return premium, against the assets of the company. Id.

Reinsurance.

39. A reinsurer may be required to pay the amount of the loss which it is liable for, directly to the insured or the party ultimately entitled to the money when the prior insurer which it has indemnified has become insolvent. Hunt v. New Hampshire Fire Underwriters' Assn. (N. H.) 514

40. The liability of a reinsurer is not lessened by the insolvency of an intermediate insurer which has become unable to pay the loss, but the reinsurer's liability is for the entire amount of the loss against which they agreed to indemnify the prior insurer. Id.

LOGS.

The owner of drifting logs which have escaped from a raft broken up by a violent storm on a lake without his fault is not under obligation to recapture and remove such of them as he can obtain only by extraordinary methods and at unreasonable expense, in order to escape liability for damages caused by them in a subsequent storm, although he has not definitely abandoned them but is proceeding to recover those which he can get without an unwarranted expenditure of money. New Orleans & N. E. R. Co. v. McEwan (La.) 134

MANDAMUS. See also CONSTITUTIONAL LAW, 5; JUDGMENT, 4; WRIT AND PROCESS, 4, 5.

1. An applicant for the writ of mandamus need not show any legal or special interest in the result, but only that he is a citizen and as such interested, in common with other citizens, in the execution of the law, when the object of the action is to enforce the performance of a public duty or right in which the people in general are interested. Wampler v. State, Alexander (Ind.) 829

2. The facts stated in an alternative writ of mandamus may be supplemented by those stated in the application in determining whether or not they are sufficient to withstand a demurrer. Id.

3. Mandamus may be invoked to force a township trustee to meet with others for the purpose of appointing a county superintendent as required by law, when they have met on a day fixed by law for that purpose, and have adjourned from day to day for want of a quorum. Id.

1. A deed absolute on its face, but shown by a separate written agreement to be a security for the performance of the personal obligation of the grantor to the grantee, is a mortgage. Sun Fire Office v. Clark (Ohio) 562

2. A mortgage to secure an antecedent debt, which is filed before the actual entry of a judgment which is filed soon afterward on the same afternoon, will not have priority over the judgment, but their liens will be equal. Goetzinger v. Rosenfeld (Wash.) 257

3. A mortgage will not be rendered invalid by the fact that all the money which it is given to secure is not paid over at its execution and it does not state that it is given for future advances, if it is given in good faith for a needed amount, and the money is paid over as fast as it can be raised by the mortgagee. Dummer v. Smedley (Mich.) 490

4. A lien may be given to a second mortgagee and to a receiver of a corporation, for money advanced to pay interest on the first mortgage and taxes, as against attachment creditors of the corporation. Id.

5. Attachments levied on the property of a mortgagor subsequently to the execution of the mortgage are properly given priority over money afterwards paid over on the security of the mortgage in accordance with the agreement under which it was executed. Id.

6. A mortgagee cannot sell the land under a power of sale, when there has been no default or breach of the conditions of the mortgage, so as to pass a good title, even to a bona fide purchaser for value or to any subsequent purchaser from him. Rogers v. Barnes (Mass.) 145

7. A mortgagor can recover the damages sustained by him from the wrongful execution of a power of sale in the mortgage when there was no default, even if the sale was an absolute nullity, if a subsequent transfer has placed the property in the hands of a purchaser for value with a title which appears perfect on the records and constitutes a cloud on the mortgagor's title. Id.

2. The installation of an electric-light plant may be provided for at special election under Mich. Laws 1891, act No. 186, and the provisions of the charter of the city of Negaunee. Id.

3. A municipal corporation may not declare that to be a nuisance which in fact is not, although it is empowered by law to declare what shall constitute a nuisance. Keansville v. Miller (Ind.) 161

4. An ordinance declaring that any building or structure of any kind partially destroyed by fire, which shall be permitted to remain in such condition after notification to remove, repair, or rebuild it, shall constitute a nuisance, without making any limitations with regard to its dangerous character by reason of its weak condition or location or surroundings,—is void. Id.

5. An ordinance making it unlawful to keep any hog within the corporate limits of a town cannot be held void for unreasonableness under statutes giving power to define nuisances and to regulate and control the keeping of animals in the town. [Affirmed by divided court.] Darlington v. Ward (S. C.) 326

6. The distance of 100 feet fixed by ordinance as the nearest to a church, schoolhouse, or dwelling that a steam shoddy machine or steam carpet-beating machine shall be established, is not unreasonable. Ex parte Lacey (Cal.) 640

1. A mere failure to guard against a certain result is not actionable negligence unless under all the circumstances it might have been reasonably foreseen by a man of ordinary intelligence and prudence. New Orleans & N. E. R. Co. v. McEwen (La.) 134

2. The common law imposes no duty upon the owner to use care to keep his property in such condition that persons, even children of tender years, going thereon without his invitation, may not be injured. Dobbins v. Missouri, K. & T. R. Co. (Tex.) 573

3. Defects in the railing of a platform connected with a grain elevator do not render the owner of the premises liable to a person who was injured by the fall of the railing while he was leaning against it, thus putting it to a use for which it was not intended. Kinney v. Onsted (Mich.) 665

4. The maintenance of an excavation so near a path designed for the use of persons going to and from a railroad station platform on business as to be dangerous to one straying from the same does not render the company liable for the death of a child who fell therein while playing along the path. Dobbins v. Missouri, K. & T. R. Co. (Tex.) 573

5. The rule imposing upon the owner the duty not to permit any dangerous excavation to remain on his land so near a street or highway as to endanger persons who may accidentally stray from the same does not apply where one approaches the excavation from another route. Id.

6. Operating small cars by a dummy engine in a street at a low rate of speed, with occasional stops, without precautions to prevent children getting upon them, does not create a liability for the death of a child that got upon the cars and was thrown or fell from them. Jefferson v. Birmingham R. & Electric Co. (Ala.) 458

1. A formal declaration that a thing is a nuisance does not necessarily make it so, and the failure of a statute to declare it to be a nuisance does not technically keep it from being one if it is treated as such in the statute. Harrington v. Providence (R. I.) 305

2. Legislative power to declare certain things nuisances per se in the exercise of its police power extends to privy vaults in cities. Id.

2. The use of the masculine pronoun in Mo. Const. art. 8, § 12, and the statutes relating to the qualifications of a county clerk (§ 1965), does not restrict the right to hold such office to males, since other provisions of the Constitution expressly provide that certain officers must be males, while an express provision that the clerk should be a male citizen, which previously existed in the statute, has been dropped. Id.

1. A partnership association organized under the laws of Pennsylvania is regarded in Massachusetts as an association or partnership, and not as a corporation, for the purpose of bringing an action against it. Edwards v. Warren Linoline & G. Works (Mass.) 791

partnership association may be paid by the giving of a promissory note, if the note is immediately converted into money and the proceeds applied for the benefit of the corporation. Rouse, H. & Co. v. Detroit Cycle Co. (Mich.) 794

3. Technical noncompliance with the statute in the formation of a partnership association, and failure to comply with the statutory requirements in its subsequent management, will not render subsequent stockholders who had no knowledge of the defects and had no intent to become partners liable as such, in the absence of a statutory provision making them so, for goods furnished by one who dealt with the concern as a limited association. Starer & A. Mfg. Co. v. Blake (Mich.) 798

4. Omission in a single instance by the manager of a partnership association, of the word "limited" in dealing with a correspondent, will not render the members of the association liable as partners, in the absence of anything to show that any indebtedness, damage, or liability arose in consequence of that act. Id.

1. It is not proper to strike a plea from the files because it is insufficient in substance or form, but the remedy in such case is by demurrer. Consolidated Coal Co. v. Peers (Ill.) 624

2. A presumption against the pleader as to the contents of an instrument will arise when he bases a claim upon it without setting it forth in hac verba or making averments which definitely show its contents. Id.

3. An allegation that the defendant's servants recklessly and wantonly or intentionally caused a child to leave cars of a dummy line in a street while they were in motion is not sufficient to show negligence without anything to show that the conditions were not proper for the child to get off. Jefferson v. Birmingham R. & Electric Co. (Ala.) 458

4. A plea to an action by a corporation, alleging that it has been dissolved by a forfeiture of its charter and by misuser of its franchises, is good, against a general demurrer or mere motion to strike, as an allegation that the charter has been forfeited in the manner prescribed by law. Merritt v. Gate City Nat. Bank (Ga.) 749

5. An allegation that a note "is what is denominated under the laws of Kentucky a 'peddler's note'" is a mere legal conclusion, and does not sufficiently aver that the vendor of the article for which the note was given was an itinerant person. Union Nat. Bank v. Brown (Ky.) 508

PROXIMATE CAUSE.

1. Negligence may be the proximate cause of an injury which directly results therefrom, although the particular consequences were unusual and could not ordinarily have been foreseen. Graney v. St. Louis, I. M. & S. R. Co. (Mo.) 638

2. An act must have been the proximate cause of the damage in order to render the person who did it liable therefor. New Orleans & N. E. R. Co. v. McEwen (La.) 184

PUBLIC IMPROVEMENTS.

1. Delay and negligence of city officers in providing a fund for the payment of street-grade warrants by levy and special tax or assessment will not render the city liable to an action,—at least so long as the assessment plan can be enforced in any way. German-American Sav. Bank v. Spokane (Wash.) 259

2. The sale of a narrow strip from the front of property abutting on a street, for the sole purpose of avoiding a street-improvement assessment, after the city has entered into a contract for the improvement but before the lien of the assessment attaches, is void, so far as concerns the assessment. Eagle Mfg. Co. v. Davenport (Iowa) 480

3. The lien of an assessment for a street improvement attaches from the time when labor is first done or material furnished by the contractor in making the improvement after the contract is made, and not from the adoption of a resolution for doing the work or the letting of the contract therefor, under Iowa Acts 28d Gen. Assem. chap. 14, § 12, providing that the assessment shall be a lien from the "commencement of the work." Id.

4. Land purchased after the execution of a contract for a street improvement, with the knowledge, actual or constructive, on the part of the purchaser, that a strip of land 2 feet wide between the land purchased and the street to be improved had previously been sold by his grantor for the sole purpose of avoiding the easement, is liable for such assessment although the assessment was made for a lawful purpose. Id.

5. The owner of land abutting on a street for the improvement of which a contract has been entered into may lawfully sell a strip from the front of his property, of less width than the 150 feet which would otherwise be liable for the assessment, if such sale is in good faith, for legitimate purposes, and not merely a subterfuge to defeat the assessment. Id.

QUO WARRANTO. See also CORPORATIONS, 19.

1. The state may oust a street-railway company from its franchise to operate a railway in streets, by quo warranto proceedings brought on relation of the city, although the franchises were derived directly from the city under ordinances passed in the exercise of charter power conferred on the city by the state, which thus made the grant through the agency of the city. State, Kansas City, v. East Fifth Street R. Co. (Mo.) 218

2. A city cannot contract away, or in any way abridge, the sovereign power of the state to proceed against a street-railway company by quo warranto for forfeiture of its franchises, or even to do so on the relation of the city. Id.

1. A company which purchases all the property and rights of another railroad company, including a lease, and which takes charge of the leased road, operates it for a long time, and elects to sue and recover money due the lessee from the lessor, must be held to have assumed the obligations of the lease, and not be a mere tenant by sufferance. Schmidt v. Louisville & N. R. Co. (Ky.) 809

2. An abandonment of a railroad lease by a company which has acquired the lessee's property and rights is not authorized by the mere failure of the lessor to pay the money due under the lease, when the contract gives the lessee a lien therefor, and does not provide that it shall be a ground for forfeiture, although there are other conditions of forfeiture expressed. Id.

3. The lessor of a railroad which is leased under statutory authority without any provision exempting the lessor from liability remains liable for an injury resulting from negligent omission of a duty owing by it to the public,—such as the proper construction of its road. Lee v. Southern P. R. Co. (Cal.) 71

4. The lessor of a railroad is liable to an employee of its lessee who is injured by the imperfect construction and maintenance of the rails and track. Id.

5. The provision against leasing a franchise so as to relieve it or property held under it from the liability of the lessor, grantor, lessee, or grantee, made by Cal. Const. art. 12, § 10, does not give an employee of the lessee of a railroad a right of action against the lessor company, upon the fiction that it is his employer, but merely enables him to enforce his judgment, based on the negligence of his employer, against the property. Id.

6. Standing so near a passing train that there is danger of being drawn under it by a current of air is negligence, although the person does not stand near enough to be struck by the train. Graney v. St. Louis, I. M. & S. R. Co. (Mo.) 683

Fences.

7. Inclosed lands within the meaning of a statute requiring a railroad to fence its right of way through inclosed lands are those surrounded by a fence, hedge, ditch, wall, or any line of obstacle interposed so as to part off and shut in the land, and set it off as private property. Kimball v. Carter (Va.) 570

8. The inclosure of lands need not be by continuous and lawful fence at all times sufficient to prevent stock passing through it, in order to constitute them inclosed lands within the meaning of a statute requiring a railroad right of way to be fenced through such lands. Id.

9. The inclosure of lands leased by a lessee from different parties is sufficient to make them inclosed lands while in his possession, within the meaning of a statute requiring a railroad through them to be fenced, if the entire track in his possession is inclosed, although separate parcels are not divided by fences. Id.

Crossings.

10. A farm crossing is not a "traveled road or street" within the meaning of a statute requiring the bell or whistle of a locomotive to be sounded where a railway crosses such road or street. Czech v. Great Northern R. Co. (Minn.) 302

11. Reasonable care may require the giving of signals at farm crossings when they are peculiarly dangerous and a train is approaching at great speed, although the statute requiring signals does not apply to such crossings. Id.

12. An action for negligence in running a train at a rate of speed prohibited by ordinance, over a crossing at which there does not appear to have been any gates or watchmen, is not defeated by the subsequent substitution of an ordinance which makes the same limitation except when gates and a watchman are provided. Graney v. St. Louis, I. M. & S. R. Co. (Mo.) 633

13. A steam railroad has the right of way over a crossing as against an electric street railway, and may run its cars at such speed as it chooses, if it exercises proper care in giving signals. New York & G. L. R. Co. v. New Jersey Elec. R. Co. (N. J. Sup.) 516

14. The same character or degree of care to avoid collision must be exercised by those operating an electric car along a public highway, in crossing a steam railroad, that is required from persons driving across it with ordinary vehicles, and they must look and listen for an approaching train. Id.

15. The failure of a railroad company to sound a whistle or ring a bell as required by statute, on a train's approach to a highway crossing will preclude, under the rule as to contributory negligence, a recovery by such company against an electric-railway company for damages resulting from a collision caused by the latter's negligence. Id.

16. An agreement between an electric-railway company and a railroad company, that the former shall have a derailing switch near a crossing as a precaution against collisions, and that a conductor of an electric car before it passes over the crossing shall look in both directions and listen for the approach of a railroad train, does not excuse the railroad company from giving the statutory signals as a warning of the approach of a train. Id.

WATERS.

17. Railroad companies are not charged with the duty of preventing the accumulation of water on their rights of way by Tex. Rev. Stat. 1895, art. 4436, providing that in no case shall any railroad company construct a road-bed without first constructing such necessary culverts or sluices as the natural lay of the land requires for the necessary drainage thereof. *Dobbins v. 1. A remainder will be regarded as vested, rather than contingent, if the disposition is so obviously upon the border as to be inherently doubtful between the two. Bigley v. Watson (Tenn.) 679

2. A remainder to the children of a woman who has an estate for life is not extinguished until her death, although she may be very old and childless, as the law does not assume that there is an impossibility of issue at any age, however great. Id.

3. The fee is not in abeyance while a remainder is contingent, under a consent decree in partition giving one party a life estate, with remainder at her death to her children then living or the issue of such as may be dead; but the fee abides with her during such contingency; and if the line of remaindermen is extinct at her death her title is freed from the remainder and subject to disposal by her will. Id.

4. The statute abrogating the rule in Shelley's Case (Tenn. Acts 1851-52, chap. 91, § 11) by providing that, on the termination of a life estate with remainders to heirs or heirs of the body of the life tenant, such heirs shall take as purchasers by virtue of the remainder so limited to them, gives no rights to "heirs" to whom no remainder was limited, as against devisees of one who was not only a life tenant but in whom the fee abode subject to a contingent remainder to her surviving children or issue of children, when by the extinction of the line of her descendants during her life the remainder failed and her title at the moment of her death became absolute. Id.

1. Dissensions between two persons who are equal owners of the stock of a corporation 88 L. R. A.

and are also its officers will not justify the appointment of a receiver so long as no actual wrong is committed by either of them. Wallace v. Pierce-Wallace Pub. Co. (Iowa) 123

2. A receiver of that part of the property of a corporation which consists of shares of stock in another corporation cannot be appointed on account of a disagreement respecting the management and control of the latter corporation, between two persons who are the officers of the former corporation and own all its stock in equal shares. Id.

3. A solvent corporation cannot be put into the hands of a receiver on account of a debt not reduced to judgment or secured by any lien on property of the corporation. Id.

4. The jurisdiction of a state court which has appointed a railroad receiver to direct him as to the wages to be paid for operating the road within that state is not defeated by the fact that the employees in operating the road crossed the state boundary and incidentally performed some service in another state, although the receivership is ancillary to a receivership in such other state. Guarantee Trust & S. D. Co. v. Philadelphia, R. & N. E. R. Co. (Conn.) 804

5. A railroad mortgagee is not liable for unpaid wages or other obligations incurred by a receiver appointed at the mortgagee's instance in a foreclosure suit, although the trust fund is sufficient to pay them, unless such responsibility was imposed by the court as a condition of the appointment or the continuance of the receiver in office. Farmers' Loan & T. Co. v. Oregon P. R. Co. (Or.) 424

6. Taxes upon the shares of stock in an insurance company, which are by statute charged to and made payable by the corporation, are a demand payable out of its assets in the hands of its receiver in case it becomes insolvent after they become due. *Boston & A. 1. The constitutional provisions requiring three several readings, the printing of bills, and an aye and nay vote on final passage of any bill, are mandatory. Cohn v. Kingsley (Id.) 74

2. A court may go back of the enrolled bill to the journals of both houses of the legislature to ascertain whether or not the constitutional requirements were obeyed in the passage of the act in question. Id.

3. The journals of both houses of the legislature must affirmatively show that the provisions of the Constitution in regard to the passage of any law were substantially followed by the legislature in the passage of any act the validity of which is questioned. Id.

4. The failure of the journals of both houses of the legislature to show that any step required by the Constitution in the passage of a law was taken is conclusive evidence against the validity of the bill, that it was not taken. Id.

5. Neither house of the legislature can suspend the provision of the Constitution which requires three readings on separate days in each house except in case of urgency, and then there must be an aye and nay vote by two thirds of the house voting with reference to only one bill then before the house. Id.

6. The power to increase the capital of a corporation by by-law, which is given by Tenn. act March 23, 1875, is not repealed by Tenn. act March 27, 1883, making a different provision for an increase of stock, even if that applies to a corporation under a former act. Peck v. Elliott (C. C. App. 6th C.) 616

7. A special law to prevent fishing for profit by citizens of one county in the waters of another county, which is limited to certain counties, is in violation of the provision of S. C. Const. art. 3, § 34, against special laws "where a general law can be made applicable." State v. Higgins (S. C.) 561

8. A statute attempting to abolish several inferior courts, and to substitute one court in their place, cannot be separated so as to uphold the substituted court in place of some of them, if one is protected from destruction by the Constitution and its judge is a member of the others. Johnson v. State (N. J. Err. & App.) 873

9. A statute limiting the liability of a railroad company for fires to the difference between the amount of the loss and the amount of insurance upon the property applies to a pre-existing policy of insurance on which a loss occurs after the passage of the statute. *Leavitt v. 1. The forfeiture of the "road" of a street-railway company under a clause in the grant of the franchise stating that the company will forfeit the road to the city in one year after it ceases to operate the road includes the rails as well as the franchise. Tower v. Tower & S. Street R. Co. (Minn.) 541

2. The forfeiture of the road of a street-railway company to the city in case of failure to operate it for one year, which is provided for by a condition in the ordinance granting the franchise, is not unenforceable on the ground that it is a penalty or liquidated damages which can be recovered, but it may be judicially enforced. Id.

3. A contract that nonuser of street railway tracks for any specified time shall not operate as a forfeiture of the franchise cannot be made by a city, either by ordinance or otherwise, since this would involve authority to grant the right of the use of streets for private purposes. State, Kansas City, v. East Fifth Street R. Co. (Mo.) 218

4. Entire failure to operate a street railway for three years, when the ordinance under which the franchise is exercised requires cars to run sixteen hours every day in the year, constitutes a nonuser which forfeits the franchise. Id.

5. A street railway company has the right to use the trolley system without the sanction of the mayor and city council, where its charter authorizes it to use "any motive power and means of traction which the mayor and city council may sanction or which shall be authorized to be made use of in the city . . . by another corporation exercising street-railway franchises thereon," and the legislature has subsequently given express authority to other companies to use the trolley system in that city. Hooper v. Baltimore City Pass. R. Co. (Md.) 509.

6. The rule that a pedestrian must stop, look, and listen before crossing a railroad track applies to a street railway operated by electricity. Hoelzel v. Crescent City R. Co. (La.) 703

7. A pedestrian who suddenly attempts to cross an electric railway in the night when a street car is approaching so near that it must be visible and its noise apparent must be held negligent, so that no recovery can be had against the railway company for his death if he is struck by the car. Id.

8. Negligence in running a car upon an electric street railway having a sprinkler thereon upon which waving black coats are hung, without reasonable care to prevent frightening horses, renders the street railway company liable; and it would seem to be immaterial who placed the coats in that position, if the car was operated with knowledge that they were there. McCann v. Co. (N. J.) 236

9. Reasonable means to prevent frightening horses and thereby injuring persons riding or driving along the street must be taken when a street railway car is propelled in such a condition that a reasonably prudent man would apprehend that it would frighten horses. McCann v. Consolidated Traction Co. (N. J.) 236

TELEGRAPHS.

A telegraph company is not liable to a banker who cashes a draft upon the faith of a telegram from the drawee purporting to authorize the drawer to make such a draft because of a mistake in transmitting the amount for which the draft is authorized, as the company cannot be liable to a stranger to whom it has never delivered the message and to whom it owes no duty whatever merely because he has seen the telegram and acted upon it to his injury. *Mc'ornick v. TENDER.

Money tendered and paid into court as the full amount due the plaintiff constitutes a full discharge if plaintiff takes it from the court, although he protests that more is due and declines to accept it as full payment, if the terms on which it was tendered are not waived by the defendant or modified by rule of court. *Jonathan Turner's Sons v. One who anchors a boat in the shallow water of a river, at a marshy place which is not navigable, and there hunts wild fowl, is guilty of a trespass as to the owner of the soil. Hall v. Alford (Mich.) 205

TRIAL. See also CARRIERS, 18; CRIMINAL LAW, 2; EVIDENCE, 25; JURY.

1. A jury trial upon appeal does not answer the constitutional guaranty of a right to be tried by jury. State v. Gerry (N. H.) 228

2. The trial court is not bound to ask or to permit counsel to ask a juror on his voir dire any question the answer to which would tend to criminate or disgrace him. Ryder v. State (Ga.) 721

3. Defendant in a criminal action did not lose his right to complain of the absence of a witness, which was not in any way occasioned by him or his counsel, because such witness was present at an earlier period of the trial, and requested defendant's counsel to be allowed at that time to go on the stand and testify, and was subsequently compelled to leave the court for providential cause, as it is defendant's right to introduce his witnesses in the order in which he or his counsel may deem best. Id.

Questions for jury.

4. The jury must determine whether or not the giving of notes in payment of subscriptions to the capital stock of a corporation was in good faith. Rouse, H. & Co. v. Detroit Cycle Co. (Mich.) 794

5. The question whether or not a person is wholly disabled so as to prevent him from doing any and every kind of business pertaining to his occupation is for the jury, where the evidence shows that he went to his office every day, but was unable to do any kind of work. Turner v. Fidelity & O. Co. (Mich.) 529

6. Questions of dispute of matters of fact relating to negligence and contributory negligence are properly submitted to the jury. New York & G. I. R. Co. v. New Jersey Elec. R. Co. (N. J. Sup.) 516

7. The negligence of a boy twelve years old, in standing so near a passing train that he is drawn under it by a current of air is a question for the jury, and cannot be declared as a matter of law. Graney v. St. Louis, I. M. & S. R. Co. (Mo.) 633

8. The question of negligence in running a tank car on an electric street railway, with waving black coats hanging thereon in such way as to frighten horses, is a question for the jury. McCann v. Consolidated Traction Co. (N. J. Err. & App.) 236

9. The question as to the materiality of the omission to mention another policy in an application for life insurance, and of the fact that the applicant was an embezzler, is for the jury under a statute providing that misstatements and concealments shall not defeat the policy unless material. Penn Mut. L. Ins. Co. v. Mechanics' Sav. Bank & T. Co. (C. C. App. 6th C.) 33

Taking case from jury.

10. A motion to exclude the evidence of plaintiff from the jury on the ground that it will not support a verdict in his favor is not proper practice in Tennessee. West Memphis Packet Co. v. White (Tenn.) 427

11. A variance between the evidence of a plaintiff and his principal witness is not the ground of a nonsuit. Wassermann v. Sloss (Cal.) 176

Instructions.

12. A charge is not erroneous because of generalization and abstractions which lead up to the statement of the law determining the rights and responsibilities of the parties on the issues of fact involved. West Memphis Packet Co. v. White (Tenn.) 427

13. An instruction in an action against a steamboat company for personal injuries to a passenger, that the evidence must satisfy them that the boat was being run by and in the interest of defendant at the time of the injury, sufficiently presents the theory that the excursion during which plaintiff was injured was an individual affair of a third person for which the company was not liable. Id.

14. An insurer is not entitled to an instruction to the jury that the failure of an applicant for insurance to mention a policy in another company, when asked about other insurance, raises the presumption that the omission was fraudulent. Penn Mut. L. Ins. Co. v. Mechanics' Sav. & T. Co. (C. C. App. 6th C.) 33

15. An instruction on a trial for murder, which refers to the homicide as the "act which the accused had committed," is improper where it is not distinctly admitted that the accused did commit the homicide, although many of the requests to charge practically conceded such fact. Ryder v. State (Ga.) 721

16. The trial court should not, on a trial for murder, in explaining the nature of expert and nonexpert testimony and the rules under which witnesses belonging to each class may give their opinions as to the sanity or insanity of defendant, charge that the testimony of expert witnesses is entitled to great weight, and add that it is the same with parties who associated with defendant, lived with him, and lived in the same community, as the probative value of the testimony of each witness should be determined by the jury. Id.

1. A public grant of lands bounded by tidewater is impliedly subject to those paramount uses to which the government as trustee for the public may be called upon to apply the water front for the promotion of commerce and the general welfare. Sage v. New York (N. Y.) 606

2. Absolute power to improve a water front for the benefit of navigation exists in the state or its municipal grantee as a trustee for the public, free from any interference by a riparian owner, whose sole right as against such authority is the statutory right of pre-emption in case of a sale. Sage v. New York (N. Y.) 606

8. A riparian owner's right of ingress and egress to his water front does not include a right to compensation for an interference therewith caused by the public improvement of the water front for the benefit of navigation. Id.

4. The privileges or easements of riparian proprietors upon tidewater include the right of access to the navigable part of the water in front, as against all but the government as trustee for the people at large. Id.

5. Lands made by filling up a water front and constructing piers, in a municipal improvement of the water front for the benefit of navigation, do not constitute an accretion to the land of a riparian proprietor, but remain the property of the city for the benefit of the public as dry land, just the same as when it was land under water. Id.

6. The governmental power of the state to control public waters cannot be lost by mere nonuser. Auburn v. Union Water Power Co. (Me.) 188

7. The fee to land under the waters of a river is in the riparian owner up to the middle of the stream. Hall v. Alford (Mich.) 205

Diversion.

8. The improvement of highways, draining of lands, and general improvement of the country, will not justify the diversion of water from a mill without compensation and due process of law. Stock v. Jefferson (Mich.) 855

9. The manner in which water diverted from a stream is returned to it is immaterial to a lower riparian proprietor, if the water is returned before the stream reaches his land. Gould v. Euton (Cal.) 181

10. A riparian proprietor cannot confer upon another person the right to divert water from a stream to use on nonriparian lands to the injury of a lower proprietor, since the riparian owner himself has a right to divert waters to riparian lands only. Id.

11. The right of a city to take water for the use of its inhabitants from a great public pond belonging to the state can be granted by the legislature, without making any compensation to those who want the water for the use of mills. Auburn v. Union Water Power Co. (Me.) 188

Water rates.

12. The current expenses which may be allowed in determining the sufficiency of the income provided by water rates consist of the money which is reasonably and properly expended in each year in collecting and distributing the water. San Diego Water Co. v. San Diego (Cal.) 460

13. Expenses of litigation contesting an ordinance fixing water rates cannot be considered as part of the expenses to be allowed in determining the sufficiency of the income produced by the rates. Id.

14. The investment on which a water company is entitled to base its compensation in determining the sufficiency of rates cannot include property not at present actually employed in collecting or distributing the water, however useful it may have been in the past or may yet be in the future. Id.

15. Water rates which will produce some reward to the owner of the water plant may nevertheless be so grossly and palpably insufficient to afford just compensation to the owner as to give the court power to relieve against an ordinance establishing such rates. Id.

16. Water rates which will produce but little more than 8½ per cent upon the actual cost of the waterworks after deducting current expenses do not constitute just compensation to the water company, where it is compelled to pay a much higher rate upon money which it appears to have fairly borrowed, when the rate paid does not appear to be above the lowest market rate, and the prudence and economy of the management are not successfully impeached. Id.

17. An ordinance fixing water rates so palpably unreasonable and unjust as to amount to a taking of the property of a water company without just compensation is not justified by Cal. Const. art. 14, § 1, providing for the establishment of such rates. Id.

2. The privilege of exemption of attorneys from arrest in certain cases, given by How. Mich. Ann. Stat. § 7258, is not exclusive of the common-law privilege from service of process while attending court or returning therefrom. Id.

3. Jurisdiction of a foreign insurance company doing business in the state without complying with the statute which requires it before doing business to appoint the insurance
